I know that I am peculiarly situated. There are three States and a Territory adjoining Wyoming, the State I in part represent, that are interested in the production of silver. Their representatives believe that silver is their most important industry. They even go so far as to say that the passage of the pending bill will bring great want and ruin to their respective States. Mr. President, I believe a man who comes to this body should always to this convictions, and under all circumstances he should have vote his convictions, and under all circumstances he should have the courage to vote them. My sentiments on the silver question when I am in New England or the East are the same as when I am in Wyoming, and up to this time I have regretted no vote of mine on this subject, and if I continue to possess my reason I will never cast a vote in this body for which I will thereafter have cause to apologize to my conscience.

Senators speak of the resources of the West. In all that West which has been described, the wealth increased from 1870, when it was $707,000,000, to $3,291,000,000 in 1890, and its population during the last two decades from 1,250,000 to 8,225,000 people. I have lived in the West for nearly twenty-five years. I have seen an uninhabited wilderness become populated with prosper-seen an uninabited wilderness become populated with prosper-ous communities. If you follow the irregular eastern bounda-ries of the States, commencing at the northeastern corner of North Dakota down to the Gulf of Mexico and including all the vast territory west of that line, you will find the population to-day as large as that of New England. In 1860 it scarcely amounted to more than 500,000 people. In 1890 they had a railroad mileage nearly equal to that of the entire United States in 1860. No pen can describe the hardships endured and the obstacles overcome under the most adverse circumstances by these people. They have built up an empire. It has not been done upon the strength of silver

But to speak for a moment upon this question of compromise. There has been no compromise offered in this body that I believe any member, Democratic or Republican, would have been justified in voting for. I had hoped that the Democratic party would prepare a compromise me sure that would in some degree suit the silver men, gratify the Republicans, and meet the approval of the President of the United States, if he should be considered in this matter, but they simply failed. The chief difficulty is that there exists an impassable gulf between the Democratic and the Republican parties. The Democratic party want something that is called cheap money, a money that will remain in a localthat is called cheap money, a money that will remain in a locality because it depreciates away from home; something that is good money in New Orleans but not so good in San Francisco. The Republican party advocates money that is good in every portion of the American Union.

The majority of the Democrats are not willing to do that which is absolutely necessary to be done, give the Secretary of the Treasury power to protect the gold that is in the Treasury so that he can maintain the parity of the two metals.

I want to see silver purchased in the future, if the Secretary of the Treasury is clothed with the power to retain gold in the Treasury so as to maintain the parity of the two metals. The Republican party in every emergency has had the courage of its

Republican party in every emergency has had the courage of its convictions and has dared to do its duty. When issues of bonds had to be made it took the responsibility and the people justified their action. The gold reserve should be increased. I believe that there should be in our Treasury $200,000,000 or $250,000,000 of gold. We are maintaining to-day more silver and more paper at a parity with gold than any other nation upon the face of the globe; no other nation under the same circumstances undertakes to do as much.

Sen tors speak of France. We have done better by silver than France has ever done. But why speak of any foreign nation. Give the Secretary of the Treasury the necessary power and we can absorb in the circulation of the country a thousand million dollars of silver and maintain its parity. The people of this country do not believe in cheap dollars, nor do I believe they will abundon our 100-cent dollar for a 58-cent dollar. This has indeed been in more ways than one an eventful year. The indusence of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of a great State and all the presented of the governor of the governor of the great State and all the presented of the governor of the gov

The influence of the governor of a great State and all the pre sure of a powerful and able press in our greatest inland city could not induce the American people to abundon the American Sunday. This year anarchy has tried to plant its doctrines in the mind of the American laborer. It has utterly failed.

This year the runs upon the banks have disclosed to the public the fact that the every-day people of this country own the money which is deposited in the banks.

Another fact will soon be leurned, that the people of our great country do not favor repudiation, nor would they accept even partial repudiation. The highest compliment was paid a few days ago in the House of Representatives to the American people by a merchant member, when referring to his own experience during a long business life. He said in dealing with the American people as a merchant, in the various States of the Union he had discovered that there were less than one-sixteenth of I per cent of the people who were dishonest.

Mr. President, the West has not been dealt by unfairly. The legislation which has been secured has developed that country rapidly. Notonly have the people flocked there to make homes, but they have succeeded in making homes. They have built up towns: they have broken nature's soil; they have made great farms, and they have become great producers. Even Colorado, of which so much is said, is already a great agricultural State. Her agri-culture is worth double that of the production of her precious minerals.

You say that no compromise could be adopted. A compromise measure could have been adopted, and a favorable compromise, but my friend from Colorado never offered any terms of compromise. My friend, the Senator from Nevada, said on the floor, in answer to my question, that he wanted no compromise. Repeal had to come. Let it come. So, if the silver men go back home empty-handed, it may be after all because they have not approached this matter in the proper spirit.

It is true, Mr. President, that there is being an effort made to stir up the people west of the Missouri River. It is true that Colorado has had her missionaries in my State. It is true that carties from Colorado has had her missionaries in my State. It is true that

Colorado has had her missionaries in my State. It is true that parties from Colorado have been up in my State trying to fire the prairies in the rear. But the people up to this point have shown no great desire to have me vote against the unconditional repeal of this law. I have confidence that they will uphold me in voting the way I believe to be right. I know an attempt has been made to bring the West to sectional alliances. The governor of Missouri and the governor of Kansas did what they could in this direction; but, be it said to the credit of the governor of Nebraska and the credit of the governor of Utah, they without mercy condemned it.

Mr. SQUIRE. So did the governor of Washington.
Mr. CAREY. The governor of Washington, too. I amglad to accept the addition. The convention met in St. Louis, but when it assembled it forgot the purpose for which it had con-

Mr. President, I have stood all the time since I became a member of this body in the same position on the silver question. did not form my opinions because I was sent to the Senate of the United States. They have been formed after years of consideration. I heard the discussion opened eight years ago next December by that distinguished Kentuckian, the late Senator Beck. I have heard it discussed during the intervening years in both House of Congress.

I have studied the question; and I believe I am right on the question. I do not doubt the convictions of those who differ with me. My young State has a high credit; my people are not with me. My young state has a high credit; my people are not in an excited condition. They believe in maintaining their high credit. The State has issued no obligations payable in other currency than the lawful money of the United States. If my votes here result in my overthrow, I shall accept it like a man. I would rather be a free man and be allowed to do that which I I believe to be right than a United States Senator compelled to listen to a clamor every time there is a stir in any section of the listen to a clamor every time there is a stir in any section of the country.

But, you ask, why do you feel compelled to vote for the repeal of the law to-day? I am compelled to vote for the repeal of this law to-day because I believe if the law is not repealed, in the absence of the power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury to strengthen the gold reserve, we shall go to a silver basis in fact, if not legally. Since the purchase clause of the Sherman law was passed we have issued a good many Treasury notes, the amount up to the 1stof July being about $140,000,000 worth. The net export of gold during the same period has been a trifle more, or about $141,000,000. The gold is gradually going out of this country. My opposition to free silver coinage has been strengthcountry. My opposition to free silver coinage has been strengthened by the statements made by three different Senators, two from Nevada and one from Color do, that they believe if it should become necessary, it would be better for us to be on a silver basis than on a gold basis.

I did not know before that free-silver advocates went so far. This country went off a specie basis in 1862, and it took sixteen years to get back to a gold basis. We do not believe the people in the West want to see any such misfortune as going to the silver standard alone befall the country. If we can not have gold and silver standards let us maintain the gold standard. There are 40,000,000 people living in the nations south of us who are on a silver basis. The stamp of their mints there, so far as we does not supressive the price of silver. we can see, does not appreciate the price of silver. All the great commercial nations of Europe have discarded silver. I do not believe it is within the power of this Government, by its mint stamp alone, to give such a value to silver of the world and maintain a ratio of 16 to 1. I believe in maintaining the high credit of my country.

But they tell us there is very little surplus silver, and a very small amount would come to our mints should we throw them open to the world. We bought about 2,000,000 ounces a month under the Bland-Allison law. The Secretary of the Treasury did not think it prudent to go beyond that point. We have bought 4,500,000 ounces under the Sherman law, yet what has been the consequence? Silver has been abundant in the markets. Silver has ste idily gone down, down, down; and all of these purchases do not appear to have held up the price at all. But not-withstanding the purchase of all this silver and the continual fall in the price of it, the production in 1891 was about two and one-

In the price of it, the production in 1891 was about two and onefourth times as great as it was in 1870.

I do not believe it is necessary for Colorado that the Government should continue the purchase of silver. Colorado was admitted as a State in 1876. We were not purchasing a dollar of silver then, and did not purchase any until 1878, except we might have purchased a little for subsidiary coinage. Colorado grew to be a great State. She was a great State in 1880, and no new State which preceded her had made greater growth in the same length of time. length of time.

In the say that free coinage is absolutely necessary for all the silver States. There is not a silver State that ever enjoyed free coinage. They have never had free coinage. Their silver was too valuable for our mints previous to 1873. Since 1878 much silver has been purchased, but it is a question with every man who studies this matter whether the Bland-Allison act and the silver-purchasing clause of the Sherman act have not been a positive injury to the silver producers, whether the storing up of this allver and keening it in view of the world at all times of this silver and keeping it in view of the world at all times has not really after all had the effect day after day to depre-

It was, supposed, of course, that the passage of the Sherman purchase law would greatly appreciate its value. There was some speculation. It did appreciate silver a little, but it went down, and from that day to this, almost without exception, it has gone down, lower gradually, until I believe it has reached the lowest point so far as the memory of man knows anything about

Mr. President, as long as I am a member of this body I shall vote my convictions. If it does not suit the people in the surrounding States I can not help it. No one is more deeply grieved than I am to think that I can not vote on these questions in the same manner that the Senators in the adjoining silver States vote, but if I voted that way I should vote opposite from what I believe to be right. It is the duty of a United States Sena-tor in the consideration of these questions to not only look at the interest of his State, but to look to the interest of the en-tire country, and, so far as I am concerned, I intend to be gov-erned by that motive and no other, feeling sure that in this instance I shall vote not only for the honor of my country, but for the highest and best interests of my State. Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, it must be a source of great gratification to the people of the State of Wyoming to know that the senior and the junior Senator united in one person as representing that State has finally delivered himself on this great question.

The original source of the remark which I saw fit to make the other day arose in a discussion between the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Dubois] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN], in which the Senator from Minnesota said:

Of the three States in question, two are not silver-producing States: they have no more interest in the coinage of silver than any other State in the Union, and they are supposed to have a very intelligent and patriotic population. Furthermore, those two States are represented by two Senators, both of whom are in favor of the repeal of the Sherman law. I should like to inquire, in view of that fact, what injustice is being done to the silver men on the floor of the Senator please name the two States which he says are represented by two Senators who are in favor of the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law?

Mr. Washburn. I will with great pleasure. They are the States of Washington and Wyeming.

ington and Wyeming.

At the time that statement was made the Senator from Wyo-ming sat quietly and supinely in his seat, and from that day until this the Senator from Wyoming has seen fit to give no utterance upon this subject. All through the time when amendments were to be offered he offered no amendment. When it was ascertained that all amendments would be lost he voted, I believe, upon one of the amendments sure to be defeated, as one who might go back to his people pretending that he had been for silver, but saying no word whatever in its defense.

Mr. President, it was fitting that I should refer to the position of the Senator from Wyoming. A vastsection of our country, embracing many States, containing a population much alike, interchangeably settling in their different States, kindred in interest, having the same hopes, the same aspirations for the prosperity of our great region, engaged in the same general businesses, were a unit—not a preponderance, but practically a unit—in favor of the free and the unlimited coinage of silver; and here apparently stood this new Commonwealth, whose people I know are unanimously in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, represented in this body by a Senator who said no word in their behalf. It was essential, Mr. President, that I should make reference to the apparent difference of sentiment in that great region of country.

If the Senator from Wyoming is content with his position, I have no objection to make to it. I leave him to his constituents. He may be contented with his vote. I leave him to deal with the people who sent him here.

Mr CAREY. Mr. President, I have no apology to make to the Senate. for I try to keep within the bounds of propriety. My relations with the Senator from Colorado Mr. Wolcott] have always been pleasant, but I felt that he had done me a wrong in his speech of Saturday.

I want to state to the Senate that I make no claim to orntory. I make no claim to being a person who can interest the galleries. I shall not use language, or attempt to use language, with a view of annoying him or with a view of embarrassing this body of which I am a member.

I stayed in my State last fall during the political campaign. tried to do my duty to the party to which I belong. I stood squarely in the campaign on the platform of the Republican party, State and national. The national platform of the Demo-eratic convention only emphasized in stronger terms the platform of the Republican convention.

I am aware that everything is being done in the State of Colorado to prejudice the people of Wyoming against me. I have on my desk letters from reputable citizens of Colorado. in which they say that if I dare to vote against the free and unlimited coinage of silver, the money and the influence of the State of Colorado will be used to ruin me.

I wish to state to the distinguished Senator from Colorado that I propose at present and in the future to do that which I believe to be right. I happen to have to day a recent magazine article discussing the silver question by the distinguished editor, Horace White, in which it is said:

It is a part of the history of the Flity-first Congress that the free-silver Senators of Nevada and Colorado, all of whom were Republicans, cooperated with the Southern Senators to defeat the force bill. So much is known It is believed that they stipulated for a sufficient number of votes to pass a silver free-coinage bill in return. This, however, is only conjecture. All that we know is that the free-coinage bill did receive a majority of votes in the Senate on June 17, 1890, and that the force bill was defeated in that body by a majority of 1 in the following January. The free-coinage bill was defeated in the House on June 25. ated in the House on June 25.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me? The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CAREY. Certainly.
Mr. HARRIS. I want to state distinctly, from the standpoint of one of a committee of three Democratic Senators during the force-bill struggle, that there never was an understanding or agreement between the Democratic Senators and the Senators agreement between the Democratic Senators and the Senators from the sliver States or any other States that any single vote should be controlled by any consideration in favor of silver or against the force bill. Such a statement as the Senator from Wyoming has just made deserves to be branded, and I rise for the purpose of branding it as an utter and absolute falsehood. Mr. CAREY. I did not make the statement on my own authority, but quoted it only as current literature of the times. Mr. HARRIS. The Senator repeated it from a statement made by somebody else. It is that statement that I want to brand as an utter falsehood, no matter from what source it may brand as an utter falsehood, no matter from what source it may

Mr. CAREY. If the Senator from Tennessee had been in his seat a few moments ago he would have heard me say that I had never heard an intimation from his side of the Chamber that there had been a trade.

Mr. HARRIS. For what purpose did the Senator use the paper that he holds in his hands if it was not intended to make the impression that there was an agreement between the Democratic side and the Senators from the silver States in respect to that measure?

Mr. CAREY. I shallouly refer, in answer to the Senator from Tennessee, to the references which have been made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Wolcorr] to the Democratic side, especially to that of Saturday last when referring to the vote on the force bill. Among other things he said:

Most of them stood nobly by their Western brothers, but a few of them developed bitter hostility toward our section and our interests. We who are from States where silver is produced claim and have claimed no especial consideration growing out of the fate of that measure, but I confess we had expected that the struggle for very existence which we have made on this foor would bring us sympathy and not denunciation from representatives of a section which not long ago made an appeal on similar grounds, and did not make it in vais.

I did not intend to reflect upon any member of this body, but I only wanted to call attention to the language which was used by the Senator from Colorado, in which he said that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WASHBURN] had profferred my vote, which to me was very offensive.

As I have already said, I believe a good compromise measure As I have already said, I believe a good compromise measure could have been effected if the Democrats on that side and the silver men on this side could have come squarely up to the fact and recognized that the gold reserve was very low in the Trensury, and that it was absolutely necessary to protect that reserve something might have been done. In the absence of that compromise, I believe it absolutely necessary to protect the reserve to pass the pending measure. I do not believe that any man who feels about it as I do can conscientiously vote to retain the purchase clause of the Sherman act upon the statute book.

The compromise measure which was offered by the Democrats contined, as given out by the newspapers - and I did not see a copy of it except in the newspap rs—two important provisions, one to coin the seigniorage in the Treasury and the other to buy silver for eleven months, under the purchase clause of the Sherman law, and to coin that at its coinage value, not its bullion value. If we figured it up, that would have done as much damage as continuing under the Sherman purchase act for more than three years, while it would only have helped the silver industry to the extent of 48,000,000 ounces.

I went to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] to-day and called his attention to his remark in his speech of Saturday I thought it was very unjust and unfair for a Senator to make such a statement us he had done. He did not choose to do that which I thought was right toward me, which would have required but a manly word.

I had not intended to say a word on the silver question; and the remarks I made to day were to call attention to the sentence that the Senator from Colorado used in his speech on last Saturday, which I still think was unjustified, especially by the Senator whom I had every reason to think had for me the most kindly feeling.

Mr. WASHBURN. Mr. President, since I have been drawn into this debate to-day, perhaps it is but justice to myself, as well as justice to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], that I should say a word.

In a very heated colloquial debate which occurred during the discussion on this bill when reference was made to not admitting the Senators from the States of Washington, Montana, and Wyoming, I stated in a general way that I considered two of those States as having no interest in the silver question, and, as I understood it, the Senators representing those States were infavor of the repeal bill. In that heated colloquial discussion a very pointed question was put to me as to how I knew it, and, rather under excitement, I said I knew it from the Senators themselves. I regretted it the moment I said it, because I thought it was hardly just to those men for whom I claimed to speak.

hardly just to those men for whom I claimed to speak.

I desire to make that as an apology not only to the Senators from those States, but to the Senate. I told what was true. The Senator from Wyoming has never told me that he was going to vote for repeal, but in conversations which had occurred he was as earnest, as outspoken, as clear, and as intelligent on this subject as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and I said what I did with the same confidence that I would if the position of the Senator from Ohio had been questioned.

of the Senator from Ohio had been questioned.

As to my proffering the vote of the Senator from Wyoming, that is simply absurd. As that Senator has shown here to-day, it is not necessary for anybody to speak for him, he can speak for himself, and he has the courage to vote for himself.

it is not necessary for anybody to speak for him, he can speak for himself, and he has the courage to vote for himself.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I shall not refer to the allusion of the Senator from Wyoming to the local affairs of Colorado.

I shall have no personal controversy with the Senator from Wyoming. The Senator reads from a magazine for the purpose of making the charge that the Senators from Colorado and Nevada had entered into some combination with reference to their votes on the force bill for votes in return on the silver bill, and when his attention is called to it by the Senator from Tennessee when his attention is called to it by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Harris], he says "Oh, I have made no charge."

Mr. President, that would not go down before a justice of the peace, let alone the Senate. The Senator rose here for the purpose, the express purpose, of making that charge, and it would have been a good deal more manly if he had made it as a charge and not as an innuendo. That charge has been made again and again. The Senator from Wyoming has heard it contradicted by Senators on both sides of the Chamber whose reputation at home and abroad are quite as good for truth and veracity as his. He knew that it had been contradicted by every one of the Senators to whom he alluded. He intended it for a charge. I shall treat it as a charge, and the Senator will not escape by saying it is a magazine article.

Mr. President, I want to say now, as I have previously stated, that long before the silver question came into the Senate for any action at that time, the Senators who were alluded to had announced their position upon that bill—and the Senator from Wyoming knows that as well as I do—there was not a Senator on the other side of the Chamber who had not already committed himself in favor of free coinage. What had we to trade? They were free-coinage men, as we were free-coinage men. We were opposed to the bill called the elections bill as they were opposed to it; and as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has done, I denounce here and now the statement that there was any trade or any arrangement or understanding, directly, indirectly, or in any other way, as without the slightest foundation in fact.

I am not going over my connection with the force bill. I announced when it came into the Senate what my position was on it; but whether I had or had not, I supposed, acting upon the principle which the Senator himself lays down, I had a right to oppose it or support it.

Mr. President, I want to repeat, once for all, that there is no truth in that statement.

truth in that statement.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] has absolved me for what part I had taken in the discussion which has led up to this ripple on the surface of the placid Senate, I do not think it is necessary for me to go into it. The Senator stated, as I understood him, that I had but said what was the truth. I did not attempt to define his position until after his position had been defined by another Senator.

I could not, at any rate, have any personal controversy with the Senator from Wyoming. I served with that Senator in the other branch of Congress when he was representing his Territory there and I was representing the Territory of Idaho. We sat side by side when our Territories became States of the Union. There is no better representative of Western interests on this floor, or on the floor of the other House, than the Senator from Wyoming; and while I deeply regret that he does not, in my judgment, represent his people on this question, and while I think it will be something that will come back to plague him in after days, yet I know that he is following his conscience, that he is doing what he thinks is right.

I desire now tosay a few words in regard to the pending bill. I do not like to get back to that dry and stale subject, for I know the Senate has been much better entertained during the last hour. I presume unconditional repeal will pass the Senate, and the last prop will be stricken from under silver, and the issue of more money will cease. I trust that those who have brought about this result are comfortable and easy in their minds. They have charged, and the metropolitan press has reiterated the statement, that nothing stands in the way of restored confidence and prosperity except the Sherman act. For that reason they have refused any and all overtures looking to any financial legislation to accompany repeal. They have been determined to stand upon that plank alone.

I should like to inquire, and should be pleased to know of the distinguished Senators who are pressing this measure to its passage, if they will now be content, or if they propose to bring in another bill for the relief of the country? In order to justify your action prosperity must come and abide with you. If in the course of three or four months there should be distress and want and idle men, you can not charge it again to the tariff or some other legislation. The country has followed you once in this. They will not be fooled by you again.

It does not seem to me that prosperity can follow the content of our approximation of the country which the content is a support of the country which the content is a support of the country which the content is a support of the country which the content is a support of the country which is a support of the cou

It does not seem to me that prosperity can follow the contraction of our currency which you have now inaugurated. If I am right what are you going to do? You can not borrow money by issuing gold bonds. That at best will be but a temporary palliative. You can not continue to borrow money and continue to prosper. Unless permanent prosperity comes as the result of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, you have deceived the people who will hold you to account.

you have deceived the people who will hold you to account.

I subscribe to the doctrine of the greatest good to the greatest number. There are more people in the East than in the far West. If it were settled that one section must suffer in order that another may prosper, it is perhaps better that we should be the victims because there are fewer of us.

be the victims because there are fewer of us.

I sincerely hope that unconditional repeal will light the furnaces and make the spindles hum in Massachusetts, bringing joy and comfort to the laborers and their families, for it will enforce idleness and bring misery in Idaho. I hope it will give peace and plenty in Louisiana, for gloom will settle down upon the hearthstones of brave and energetic families in Colorado. I trust that more of the good people of Connecticut will be enabled to properly clothe their children and give them the advantages of schools and churches, for many churches and schools will be closed in Montana, and many children will be left destitute.

By this act you strike a sudden and cruel blow at the far West,

By this act you strike a sudden and cruel blow at the far West, and leave but little hope for the near future. Unless great prosperity comes to the wage-earners of the East there is no justification for it. If you have simply added to the wealth of the rich, you will be called to a fearful reckoning. We have the right to know what you intend doing after you shall have committed this deed. We have a right to know now, in order that hope, the last vestige of brave souls, may not be destroyed. If you have added to the already heavy burden of the struggling masses and will not propose any relief at this time, I advise that this monetary question be made the issue in every campaign which is to follow.

If you are irrevocably committed to a contraction of currency, every candidate for legislative office, whether for the lower branch or the upper branch of Congress, should be made to define his position so clearly that he can not change his mind when he reaches Washington. No matter whether the candidate be a Republican, Democrat, Populist, or what not, he should be made to say whether or no he is for the free coinage of silver. If he proclaims that he is a bimetallist he should be forced to make known to the voters what he means by that term. Every Senator on this floor avers that he is a bimetallist, yet many of them will vote for a contraction of the currency and to stop the purchase and coinage of silver. No one should be allowed to dodge or evade.

If this is to be a fight of the money power against the laboring classes and the producers, the producers should use their sure and only weapon of defense, the ballot. The people have voted steadily for silver and an enlargement of the currency, yet they have deen disappointed in the result. They understand the issue now and should make their power felt. I think some of my colleagues. The people will yet prevail. If the fight shall be made distinctively for free coinage, an overwhelming majority will be returned to both branches of Congress, which will not dare disobey the mandates of the people, nor will any President feel justified in opposing their will. When he does, then the outlook for the Republic will be dismal indeed.

I can be a Republican, and a consistent advocate of free coin-So one can be a Democrat or Populist and be equally true ver. While the provocation is great to resort to the vendeta in politics, inasmuch as we have been stabled in the house of our friends, I prefer to hold to my convictions on the other great questions while maintaining my convictions on the money question, relying on the good sense, judgment, and independence of the American people.

of the American people.

So long as I am honored with a seat in this Chamber I shall continue this fight. I shall not cease the struggle here until free coinage shall prevail or I am no longer a member of the Senate. If any of my colleagues think that I have been unduly aggressive or lacking in the observances of proper conventionalities, they have but a faint appreciation of the misery which this act will bring to my people. It is unjust and unmerited, and will rankle in their souls, but they will bear it with an equanimity worthy of the brave spirits who have subdued the frontier, founded States,

What they will do temporarily I know not, nor can I bear to contemplate the near future which is in store for them. If you could imagine every manufactory in New Jersey, Connecticut, or Massachusetts closed suddenly and without warning; if you could imagine the commerce in New York City destroyed; if you could imagine the coal fields of Pennsylvania or the granite quarries of New England shut down without one hour's warning beries of New England shut down without one hour's warning being given to those who are dependent upon these great industries to prepare for the change, you would then have but a faint idea of the effect of your action upon the people of our country. You paralyze them. Yet they will continue to be manly, self-reliant, honest, patriotic, and charitable. Their difficulties will be increased and multiplied, but they will meet and overcome them. They will neither whine, nor beg, nor starve, but will stand more erect and with clearer consciences than many a one who strikes this great and unexpected blow. this cruel and unexpected blow.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I gave notice on Saturday afternoon last of an amendment that I desired to propose. If it is now in order, I should like to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.
Mr. PASCO. It is in the nature of a substitute for the bill.
I am aware that until the bill shall be perfected a substitute will not be in order. Therefore if there are any other areas and the property of the proper not be in order. Therefore, if there are any other amendments which Senators desire to propose, they can proceed. If there are none other I desire to offer my substitute at this time, and ask that it be read.

Mr. STEWART. I have another amendment which I desire to offer for the reduction of the gold in our gold coinage 25 per cent. I ask that the amendment be read at the desk, and then I shall give a word of explanation.

VICE-PRESIDÊNT. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill the fol-

That the gold coins of the United States shall be a one-dollar piece, a quarter eagle or two-and-a-half-dollar piece, a three-dollar piece, a half eagle or five-dollar piece, an eagle or ten-dollar piece, and a double eagle or twenty-dollar piece; and the weight of standard gold of the gold dollar shall be 18.35 grains; of the quarter eagle or two-and-a-half-dollar piece, 48.35 grains; of the three dollar piece, 58.05 grains; of the half eagle or five-dollar piece, 57.5 grains; of the eagle or ten-dollar piece, 375 grains; of the double eagle or twenty-dollar piece, 387 grains, which coins shall be a legal tender in all payments at their nominal value.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, it has been demonstrated by statisticians that in Europe and America, as well as in Asia, gold has appreciated in the last twenty years at least 50 per cent; also that such appreciation is the result, to a great extent if not wholly, of the legislation against silver, legislation dispensing with the use of silver, thereby throwing an additional demand upon gold and enhancing its value.

It has been suggested in many of the arguments that improved application of the fall in the control of the control of the fall in the control of the fall in the control of the contro appliances of production had occasioned a portion of the fall in the prices of commodities and of the advance in the price of gold. That, however, was seriously combatted, so far as the staple articles are concerned, and I think successfully; but the statistics of China, where there has been no improved method of production, and where transportation and production are conducted in the same manner as they were a thousand years ago, we find the same appreciation of gold.

I do not propose to right the entire wrong, but an increase of 50 per cent in the obligations of all existing contracts, which amounts to an enormous sum, to many thousand millions of dollars, is manifestly unjust. I think if we now redress a part of the wrong, and, instead of reducing the amount of gold in gold coin 50 per cent, we reduce it 25 per cent, we shall grant a just relief to that extent, and a very necessary relief if justice is to be maintained in this country. No person will have a right to complain, because the obligations or bonds of the United States are payable in gold or silver coin of standard value of July 14, 1870. There is an abundance of silver coin to meet those obligations, and if there were not, there is gold enough already coined for that purpose. So far as the equity between the debtor and creditor is concerned, certainly this is a measure of justice.

I offer this amendment entirely on my own responsibility, having consulted no Senator about it. I do not know that any Senator except myself will vote for it; but I ask that the Senate allow me to have the yeas and nays so that I may record my own vote in favor of this measure of justice.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the emeting clause and insert:

SECTION I. That a commission, to be composed of three citizens of the United States, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to ascertain and determine by the lat day of January next the fair and just ratio between the actual and intrinsic values and gold, as a basis for the future coinage of silver, as hereinafter provided, without discrimination against either metal or charge for coinage, so that the dollar unit of coinage of both metals may be of equal actual and intrinsic value. And the said commission shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury the result reached by them as soon as practicable after the date hereinbefore named, and he shall thereupon fix and determine the weight of pure and standard silver to be coined in the silver dollar, authorized to be coined by this act, according to the said report; and the said silver dollars so authorized and thereafter coined shall be of the standard and weight thus fixed and determined by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Jazz. 2. That the coins mentioned in the previous section shall we on them coined, and shall be legal tender at their nominal value for all debts and dues, public and private, except when otherwise expressly stipulated by contract; and any owner of silver builion may deposit the same at the mints of the United States to be coined into dollars of the fineness and weight fixed in accordance with the provisions of the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That any holder of the coins authorized by this act may, after the list day of March, 1894, deposit the same with the Treasurer or any assistant treasurer of the United States in sums of not less than $10, and receive therefore certificates of not less than $10 each, corresponding with the denominations of the United States notes. The coin deposited or representing the certificate shall be retained in the Treasury for the payment of the same on demand. Said certificat

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PASCO. I desire the attention of the Senate for a few moments while I explain my amendment.

Mr. President, I stated in my speech on the 27th of September the views which I hold on this silver question. This proposed substitute has been drawn up for the purpose of carrying out these views. I do not propose now to go over the entire subject, but will very briefly explain the purpose of my proposed amendment, which is a substitute for the entire bill reported by amendment, which is a substitute for the entire bill reported by the majority of the Committee on Fin nee.

I had hoped that the minority of the committee would propose some way of carrying out the views of the Democratic party as expressed in their platform at Chicago. I had hoped that if they did not do so, some other Senator more experienced than myself in these financial questions would have done so. As that has not been done I have thought it proper, before a final vote shall be taken, that some proposition should be submitted to the Senate to corre, out the views expressed in our national plate. Senate to carry out the views expressed in our national plat-

This amendment proposes to treat silver exactly as gold is treated under existing laws, as one of the money metals of the country. It provides for its free coinage.

The difficulty to be encountered is the question of ratio. It recognizes the fact that the former ratio between silver and gold, which existed prior to 1873, has changed in consequence of the hostile legislation directed against it, and that it is necessary to ascertain what the ratio between gold and silver as money metals is before we can resume the free coinage of the latter metal.

It fixes the time for the commencement of the resumption of the coinage as the 1st of March next.

It recognizes the fact that establishing silver as one of the money metals of the country will increase its value, and a commission is to be appointed, by the terms of the proposed amendment, to ascertain what that increase will be, and what the true ratio will be between gold and silver, after the coinage privilege is restored to silver, by the let day of January next, and to give to the country the benefit of the increment when the free coinage of silver is resumed.

It proposes to do this by a commission. I see no better way of ascertaining this ratio than through a commission. This commission is to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and after this ratio shall have advice and consent of the senate; and after this ratio shall have been ascertained by this commission, whose report is to be made as soon as practicable after the lst of January next, the Secretary of the Treasury is to fix the weight of the dollar that is to be coined after that time, so that the dollar of silver will have the same actual value as the dollar of gold. It will be worth 100 cents in each instance, according to the market value of silver. It will make a silver dollar and a gold dollar of equal value if the commission reports the proper and true relation.

I submit the amendment for the purpose of bringing about a

I submit the amendment for the purpose of bringing about a correct ratio between silver and gold as coin metals and fixing the value of the two kinds of dollars, of gold and silver, so that they may be worth exactly the same.

The arrangements made in the other sections of the proposed substitute make it a complete system of itself; but I am not going at this late hour of the day to explain each section of the bill. It offers a complete coinage system. The last section repeals the entire act known as the Sherman act. I believe, Mr. President, that this is in accord with the views laid down by the Democratic party in its platform at Chicago; I believe also that it is in harmony with the views laid down by the Republicans in their platform. form at Minneapolis. If we are ever going back to the free coinage of silver, if we are ever going back to the time when dollars in silver and dollars in gold are to be of equal, actual, and intrinsic value, we must establish some such system as this.

With these few remarks, I submit my proposed substitute, and

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Scuator from Nevada yield? I desire to suggest that it is now twenty minutes after 6 o'clock. If it suits the Senator from Nevada to yield, I should like to move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Arkansas in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield for that purpose?

Mr. JONES of Nevada. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I make that motion.

Mr. FAULKNER. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will not make the motion. I know the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who is not now present in the Chamber, is very anxious, having charge of the pending bill, to complete the bill this evening, and I think he has so notified all on the floor. Therefore I hope the Senator will not make the motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am as earnest as the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Indiana to end this struggle, but the clock indicates that it is twenty minutes after 6. I do not think that we are required to sit here to unreasonable hours in order to complete the decree already understood by all people. I am not inclined to move that the Senate take a recess, for our records show that everything has been on the 17th of October which has been transacted in the Senate up to to-day; but I think the Senate ought to adjourn, and we will meet here to-morrow and I hope dispose of the pending bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the Senater from Tennessee allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HARRIS. In a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. Before the Senator makes the motion I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope that the Senate will adjourn, and let the Record show the exact fact in respect of our action. Now, I will hear the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to make the suggestion whether we morrow at 1 o'clock on the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no authority to answer for anyone but myself. I have been ready for days, I am ready now, I shall be ready at all times to take a final vote upon this question, but the practice we have adopted of taking a recess, and letting our RECORD show that every act of the Senate has been of the date of the 17th of October when not of that day, but of many other than the property absurd. I am not in favor myself of preparation. days, is utterly absurd. I am not in favor myself of presenting an obstacle to action on the bill, but I move that the Senate now adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. FAULKNER. Temporarily?
Mr. HARRIS. Oh, I withdraw it for the purpose of hearing the Senator from West Virginia.
Mr. FAULKNER. I understand that the Senator withdraws his motion temporarily to let me reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont. I am satisfied that no agreement can be made for a vote at any particular time.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no possibility of such an agreement.
Mr. FAULKNER. I have myself so learned from individual Senators, and therefore the whole question is whether we shall complete the bill to-night. Mr. MORRILL. I shall withdraw my suggestion entirely.
Mr. HARRIS. It is 6 o'clock and 25 minutes. I do not choose to sit here later. There is time to decide this question. There has been no disposition indicated to postpone it. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

to make a suggestion and withdrew the motion.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires in justice to himself to say that he did not understand the Senator from Tennessee when he withdrew his motion to adjourn. The Chair thought the motion was still pending, and therefore put the question, but if there was no motion made the Chair was in error in that respect, and of course the vote goes for naught. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to say one word by unanimous

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion to adjourn in order that the Senator from Indiana may be heard.

Mr. VOORHEES. We have been here a long time. It will take but a little while now to conclude our business and put this whole contest behind us -not over three-quarters of an hour at whole contest behind us—not over three-quarters of an hour at the outside. I have said all day, and I say now, not in any unreasonable spirit, but in the most natural spirit in the world, that I desire a vote on this question before we adjourn; and if a majority of the Senate will stay with me for the next hour, or until the discussion is ended, we shall end this controversy and put it behind us. I trust that nobody desires to go away under these aircumstances. circumstances

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, this has been a very great controversy, a controversy that affects the interests of every American citizen, upon one side of which capital and capitalistic influence have asserted and controlled power, upon the other side of which nine-tenths of the American people are opposed to capitalistic inluence. This controversy will be ended in favor of dristic influence.

Mr. JONES of Nevada, Mr. President—
Mr. HARRIS I shall interpose no dilatory motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada addresses the Chair. The Senator from Tennessee, the Chair underetands, occupies the floor by the courtesy of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Nevada was entitled to the floor and yielded to me. If the Senator from Nevada claims it,

I yield.

Mr. JONES of Nevada. I should like to proceed. It will take me but fifteen minutes to finish what I have to say.

[Mr. JONES of Nevada resumed and concluded his speech.

See Appendix.] Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I shall occupy about fifteen minutes of the time of the Senate, and no more. I do not feel that I should have performed all of my duty in this great discussion if I did not enter once more my protest against the pas-cussion if I did not enter once more my protest against the passage of the pending bill, which, in my humble judgment, is the crowning infamy of this century.

Mr. President, I voted against most of the amendments proposed because they discriminate against silver. Had these amendments been proposed by the other side and at the beginning of the debite, I would have considered it carefully, and in case nothing better could have been secured. I might have considered in the constant of the could have been secured. case nothing better could have been secured. I might have consented to vote for them, because in that event they would have come to us in a spirit of fairness, and we could not have doubted the sincerity of their advocates.

But they did not come to us in that way. The friends of the bill are opposed to any and to all amendments. When the Democratic members of the Senate, by a majority of 37 to 7, agreed upon a compromise bill to be substituted for the committee's bill, and when everybody believed an adjustment of party differences was at hand and that the end of dispute was near, the Executive veto was published in advance, the hopes of party unity vanished in the gloom of despair, a majority was silenced and the Administration was compelled to accept the aid of Republican Senators in order to avoid utter and ignominious defeat at the hands of the men who placed it in power.

I would not have voted for that proposed compromise and for much the same reason that I did not vote for these amendments. I refer to it only to show the imperious spirit in which the bill was thrust upon us and the houghtiness with which the attempt to compromise was east aside by the President.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat a statement made in the early control the distance of the compromise was cast aside by the President.

part of the discussion, that the movement which brought this part of the discussion, that the movement which brought this detestable and destructive measure here is the crowning infamy of the century. Party traditions had to be ignored in order to give it introduction here, and the convictions of a lifetime had to be violated in order to give it support. Of the 44 Democratic Senators only 7 favor unconditional repeal, and at least 3 of these 7 had always until recently been free-coinage men.

Party platforms declare for bimetallism, but the Senate proposes to establish monometallism; parties declare in favor of preserving parity between the money metals, and the Senate preserving parity between the money metals, and the Senate throws one of them overboard to find its price level in the open market with wheat and corn and cotton; parties declare in favor of preserving and maintainin; the equal value and purchasing power of all the different classes of our currency circulation, but when a proposition is submitted to incorporate the party pledges with law, it has not support enough in the Senate to second a demand for a yea-and-nay vote upon it. The Senator from Indi-ana, chairman of the Finance Committee, who has charge of the bill, told us Saturday that he does not intend to be bound by his votes in opposition to amendments proposed to the bill. He voted against a free-coinage amendment; he voted against a limited-coinage amendment; he voted against each and all the other coinage amendment; he voted against each and all the other amendments. And he says he will not be bound by these votes. Mr. President, he will be bound by them. He can not escape the responsibility. What the Senator has said in this debate is not lost, nor will it be dissipated by time. The record is made and it will remain. No recantation will ever satisfy either himself or the people at large, for his present course has been deliberately chosen. He marked it out for himself. The brief sketch of that Senator's life, as it appears in the Congressional Directory, shows that his great speech in favor of the free coinage of silver money, delivered in this Chamber on the 14th day of January, 1878, endeared him more than ever to the good people of Indiana, and they gave testimony of their good will by greatly increasing his party strength at the next election. That speech was a powerful philippic against the classes that he even now charges with manufacturing the panic which brought us here at this unusual time. That speech has not been excelled at any time in invective and in virulent denunciation. From the mouth of a Populist such aspeech would condemn him as an Anmouth of a Populist such a speech would condemn him as an An-

The speech referred to will be found on pages 331 and 338 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under date of January 15, 1878. I shall not detain the Senate long enough to read even the two paragraphs which I have marked, but will ask permission of the paragraphs which I have marked, but will ask permission of the Senate to incorporate them in my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

The extracts referred to are as follows:

In far distant times generations now unborn while examining the sources of the burdens that have descended to them will read the charge made in this presence by the late Senator from Indiana, that a combination of stock jobbers, as destitute of conscience as pirates, and inspired alone by greed for money, successful! thundered at these doors, and finally drove this Government into the mose stupendous act of bad faith and legalized robbery ever practiced upon any people since the dawn of history. Five hundred militons made by the great operators and five hundred militions bett to the plowman and the mechanic who have it all to pay.

And yet the authors, the instigators, the abettors of this crime, and the participators in its proceeds, fill the air with railing on the subject of repudiators, because they believe that a contract for the benefit of the people should be held as sacred as one for the benefit of the bondholder. Sir, for bearance on this point has ceased to be a virtue. Those who have at all times labored to keep the faith of the Government with its citizens and its creditors alike can not submit any longer to insult added to injury, to wholesale calumny added to national plunder. In some countries the habit prevails of building a cairn, a pile of stones, to mark the spot where some tragic event has happened. So let the American taxpayers, whenever the act of March, 1869, is cited each cast a stone upon it to mark the place in American history where repudiation began, and where the rights of the people were mercilessly and tracherously slaughtered.

And in every form in which the English language can be used the American people, and especially the people of the West, have been notified, not that their consent will be asked, but that they will be compelled to submit to the legislation which results in this British system of baronial landed estates, a dependent tenantry and pauper wages for the workingman. Sir, I have no word of menace to utter on this floor, but, in behalf of every laborand every owner of the soil whom I represent, I warn all such as value their investments that when these doctrines of despotism are sought to be enfored this fair land will again be convulsed in agony, and the fires of ilberty will blaze forth again, as they did a hundred years ago, in defense of the natural rights of man. May the wisdom of our fathers and the benignity of our God avert such an issue; but if it shall come, if infatuation has seized our councils, the result will only add one more instance to the long catalogue of human crime and folly, where avarice, like ambition, overleaps itself, and in its unholy attempt to rob others of their possessions losses its own.

Mr. PEFFER. No, Mr. President, the men to whom the people justly looked for help in this great struggle with the most powerful and dangerous influence among men, will be held to a strict accountability for the part they have taken here.

Mr. President, we all listened with profound sympathy to the pathetic words of the senior Senator from Colorado Friday, and the forceful eloquence of his colleague the next day. They to the forceful eloquence of his colleague the next day. They described pictures which they saw—invisible fingers painting in the future. My heart goes out to them in this hour of darkness. the future. My heart goes out to them in this hour of darkness. But brave men as they are, strong and full of courage, they know that all is not lost. They are big enough to see beyond the horizon of their own State. They look far enough to see the fertile fields of Kansas, of Nebraska, the Dakotas, and of all the great country, and they know that the vast armies of toilers in every department of industry must suffer with the miners all the evils which follow the legislation of this session of Congress. Silver mining is but part, and a small part even, of the mining industry; and miners can soon adjust themselves to changed conditions. But farmers are tied to the soil. They must stay in and take what comes. Their homes are at stake.

Agricultural communities will suffer most from what of evil is what comes. Their homes are at stake.

Agricultural communities will suffer most from what of evil is in store for the country. But let me say to miners, to farmers, and to all the rest of our toiling millions we need not long endure the burdens which this legislation places on our shoulders.

We have within ourselves every element of the power needed to throw off the yoke. We need only to husband our resources and organize our voters. This sixty days' debate has unmasked the power which oppresses. We now see the hand that smites Money is king

Money alone of all things has a value set upon it and maintained by law. Its owners are permitted to lend it at rates of interest many times higher than the average net profits on labor. It is usury, in one form or another, that is transferring wealth from the people who produce it to those who earn nothing.

This debate has disclosed the falsehoods of old party platforms and the hellowness of old party promises, and it has been been described in the hellowness of old party promises, and it has been been described in the hellowness of old party promises.

and the hollowness of old party promises, and it has brought to light the secret forces of party patronage.

The great manufacturers, the great railroad managers, the great bankers, the stockjobbers, the brokers, the usurers, and all classes that feed and fatten on the profits of other men's toil these are for the passage of this bill.

The senior Senator from New Jersey Saturday said that the honor of this victory of the money power over the people will be shared jointly by the President of the United States and the senior Senator from Ohio. Who will want to deny the correctness of the prediction? Who is there to dispute the fitness of those two distinguished men to enjoy this inheritance? If they can extract any consolation out of the indignation and maledic we have seen that all the great industries which have it.

We have seen that all the great industries which have been encouraged and protected by the Government, and all the great agencies for extracting profits that have been permitted to grow up among us, have taken sides against the people. We have seen that wherever the Government has been most lavish in its expenditures, wherever it has done most to foster and develop industry and commerce there is the most powerful combination against every demand of the people whose labor is constantly pouring trade through the channels of commerce. What are called the "business interests" have all the care of Congress, and these "business interests" are the personal interests of a few hundred speculators on the commercial exchanges. We have uncovered the banking system and shown its defects, its evils, and its dangerous tendencies.

We have seen that the Government is in partnership with the banks; that the Treasury Department is a member of the New York bank clearing house; that public moneys have been deposited by millions in national-bank depositories when there was no need of it. We have seen that high premium has been paid by the Government for its own bonds; that interest has been advanced on bonds not due, and that these premiums and advances of interest have amounted to more than a hundred million dolof interest have amounted to more than a hundred million dollars. We have seen that banks have been conducted in open violation of law, with the knowledge of all men, with the sunction and approval of the Administration, and with the open indorsement of the Senate. We have seen that these "business interests" are to be protected at all hazards, and that no appeal from the wealth producers is to be heard.

Mr. President, we insist on the use of both gold and silver as money metals; we want both coined freely and on equal terms, without discrimination in favor of or against either metal, just without discrimination in favor of or against either metal, just as the laws provided before the rule of the money-managers began. To assent to some form of compromise, if proposed by the gan. To assent to some form of compromise, it proposed by the friends of the bill, might not be inappropriate, for it would be a concession on both sides and might result in good. But to propose and urge a proposition less than we are entitled to when we know it will be rejected with scorn is to place ourselves in the attitude of suppliants at the feet of power.

Mr. President, I represent a constituency that is not craven, and they would despise their representative if he were such. Kansas was born in the dawn of the last revolution; she stands Kansas was born in the dawn of the last revolution, she status in the vanguard of this. They have not yet bartered their birthright, and they do not now propose to compromise

Kansas will take care of herself, sir. With her sisters, North, South, East, and West, in the valleys of the greatest rivers of the continent, we furnish the larger part of our foreign commerce—and it matters not to us where our customers for this

We have votes enough to change the financial policy of the Government and get rid of the usurer and extortioner, when money will be abundant and ready on call to move the crops and meet our pecuniary obligations.

We shall always be able to take care of ourselves, and now that we have notice served upon us that the interests of the money centers of the East are more important than the commerce of the West and South, we need not further trouble ourselves about protective tariffs nor tariffs for revenue. If rich men have determined that this Government was established for their bene fit, let them bear the burdens of national taxation. Let tariff duties be levied only on luxuries, let the rest of the needed revenues for Government uses be raised by taxes on large landed estates and on incomes above the line of a fair living.

Yes, Mr. President, God reigns and the Republic will live to encourage and to bless mankind. The law of progress will impel us forward and we shall rise as we go. But we must contend with all the powers of evil. Evolution comes through storms and wreckage. A great struggle now approaches—it is at hand even now. His horizon is narrow, indeed, who does not see a mighty people rising.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the die is cast. The surreptitious and fraudulent act of 1873 demonetizing silver is ratified and confirmed. The gold kings are victorious. The labors of their champion, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], at the Paris conference in 1867 and in the Halls of Congress in 1873, to destroy the people's money are crowned with success. The repeal of an act already nullified by Executive usurpation is decreed to exonerate the Secretary of the Treasury from the consequences of an open violation of law in refusing to purchase the four and one-half open violation of law in refusing to purchase the four and one-half million ounces of silver per month commanded by the act of 1890. The interest on Gladstone's growing fabric of bonded debt heretofore "unknown in the history of the world" may now absorb the wealth of America. The allied power of bonds and national banks has won a great victory.

The Trojan horse of the gold kings, bedecked with flaming banners upon which were inscribed, "Democracy," "Bimetallism," "Local Self-Government," "Reduction of Taxation," and "Civil-Service Reform," to conceal the monometallic guns of concentrated money and bonds, made a triumphal entrance into the nation's capital. The people opened wide the gates, and millions sang hosanna to "Greeks bearing gifts."

And all the people came up after him, and the people piped with pipes

And all the people came up after him, and the people piped with pipes and rejoiced with great joy, so that the earth rent with the sound of them. A day of jubilee was proclaimed and a Democratic national love feast prepared. The new recruits and the scar-worn veterans of the Democracy from every State and Territory in this broad land made haste to reach the festive board of Federal Armed Greeksfrom out the Trojan horse blocked every avenue of approach to all who bore true allegiance to the people's cause. Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democrats retired with shame, while the Hessians, recruited for plunder and spoils, feasted and made merry at the national banquet and swore allegiance to the prophet of Wall street.

The veteran Greeks, reinforced by camp-followers, office-seek ers, national banks, a venal press, and other agents of the gold trust, rallied under the banner of the prophet of false pretense and hypocrisy, and gave battle for concentrated capital against labor and prodution.

They have captured the fort and dispersed the defenders of the people. But, unlike ancient Troy, Washington is not the only stronghold of the American people. The betrayal and capture of the White House and the two Houses of Congress is not the end of the war. There are other cities and other people in this country besides those who rule in Wall street and at the capital of the nation. The honeyed words, the false promises, and the glittering banners of the gold aristocracy have lost their power of deception. The experiment of the Trojan horse which was successful in 1892 will fail in 1894 and 1896. The people will "beware of Greeks bearing gifts."

The next campaign will be fought in the open field, with no traitors in the army that will do battle for justice and equal rights. Secret foes will be discovered, exposed, and drummed out of camp. If the tentacles of the national banks have extended into the two Houses of Congress they will be cut loose, and freedom of action secured for the representatives of the people. No Wall street general will lead the conquering hosts.

people. No Wall street general will lead the conquering hosts. The race of Jackson and Lincoln is not extinct, and a man of the people will be found. The independence of the corrdinate departments of the Government will be restored. The representatives of the people in both Houses of Congress will pass laws to secure justice and equal rights without Executive interference. No command will come from the other end of the Avenue to destroy the people's money and subject the masses to the rule of an alien gold trust. Financial independence of Great Britain and all other foreign powers will be declared and maintained at any sacrifice and at all hazards. tained at any sacrifice and at all hazards.

The temporary victory of avarice and fraud is an object lesson which will not be forgotten. The people of the United States have met and overcome all opposition and removed all obstruction to their grand murch to freedom and a higher civilization. They must now grapple with the most dangerous, the most insidious, and the most relentless foe with which humanity is compelled to contend—the power of concentrated capital. It is the most dangerous, because its weapons are cunning: the most in-sidious, because its methods are secret; and the most relentless, because it is soulless and deaf to the grouns of its victims. Concentrated capital must be dethroned. The lifeblood of civilization must cease to slake the thirst of avarice. The normal circulation must be restored. The British pump must cease to drain the circulating medium of the United States into the reservoir of a London syndicate. An independent financial pol-

The schemes of the enemy will be exposed, and the paths to freedom and prosperity made plain. Concentrated capital must take warning. The luxury of revolution and extortion will be expensive. When justice is denied, the wrongdoers must take the consequences. This victory for injustice and wrong is only temporary. If capital repudiates contracts by contraction, the people will restore justice by expansion. If in the conflict the aggressor is despoiled, it will be his own fault, and not the fault of the victims he has forced to fight for self-preservation. of the victims he has forced to fight for self-preservation.

The motto in the next campaign will be not the preservation of disgraced party names, but the eternal principle of justice: not the best dollar, but an honest dollar: not an appreciating measure of value for the rich to monopolize, but an honest measure of value which will do justice to all; not to multiply parasites, but to increase wealth producers; not to maintain a false standard of governmental credit by opening the vaults of the Treasury to speculators, but to maintain the honor of the Government by the payment of debts according to contract, and meting out equal justice to all; not by taxing the masses to make donations to the classes, but by compelling the rich as well as the poor to submit to the government of law; not to violate the obligation of contracts, but to maintain equity between debtor and creditor.

Justice and equality before the law is the full measure of the demands of the people. No oligarchy of foreign or domestic money-changers must rob them of their most sacred rights.

money-changers must rob them of their most sacred rights. The people must and will resist and strike until the last armed foe expires. Let the vote be taken; let the deed be done; let the object lesson be given. We will abide the result. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. DINGLEY. It does not involve any additional charge on the Treasury. On the contrary, it relieves the Treasury from a charge of about $50,000.

Mr. McRAE. That is a matter of opinion. A great many bills come up here that gentlemen think would relieve the Treasury, but I notice that very often other gentlemen insist upon having them considered in Committee of the Whole. The title of this bill indicates that it is one which ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no doubt that the bill is subject to the point of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Although the point comes late, yet if there is any desire to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bill I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair, the bill is one which should be considered in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4292) to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to contracts for supplies in the Government Depart-ments at Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire the entire bill

Mr. DINGLEY. Not unless somebody desires it to be read again. It has been read in the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed, and that the bill be considered under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read the bill by sections.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as I began to say a few minutes ago, this bill amends section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to the purchase of supplies for the several Departments and Government establishments in Washington. Under existing statutes each Department and Government establishment invites proposals separately for furnishing the incidental supplies which it requires. The result has been that there has been no uniformity of action either in inviting the proposals or in awarding the contracts.

There have been widely various prices submitted for the several articles required. We found on examination that in the different Departments the prices of articles vary from 5 to 15 percent, and that because of this method of inviting proposals separately wholesale dealers, as a rule, do not regard the matter as of sufficient importance to make bids. It has been thought desirable that all these proposals should in some way be practically brought together in order that the Government may get the benefit of wholesale rates, and in order that there may be uniformity as to the prices paid for these supplies for the several Departments Government establishments, and those prices always the lowest. It has been found necessary, however, that each Department should have the control not only of the character of the list of supplies desired, but also of determining the quality. For that purpose, and in order to secure uniformity, this bill provides three amendments to the existing statute. First, that the Secretary of the Treasury shall designate a common time at which all these bids shall be opened. Secondly, that after each bid has been examined by whoever may be in charge of the matter in the several Departments the Secretary of the Treasury shall designate a board, to consist of one person representing each Department. nate a board, to consist of one person representing each Department, to examine the several proposals and especially the recommendations of the several Departments and decide which of the bids shall be accepted and which rejected.

The result will be that only the lowest bids will be accepted, and if it is found that a lower proposal is made for supplies for one Department than for another, then a new invitation for proposals must go out as to the same articles for other Departments for which higher prices have been bid, in order that the several Departments may have the lowest prices, that there may uniformity on the prices, and at the same time that the Government may have the benefit of wholesale prices on these large purchases

I may state that the incidental supplies which this bill covers I may state that the incidental supplies which this bill covers now furnished to the several Departments and Government establishments in Washington amount to over a half million dollars annually. There can be scarcely any doubt that upon this plan there will be a saving of at least 10 per cent—the commission hope for more. If the saving should be only 10 per cent, it will amount to $50,000 a year, and possibly it may be more. The commission, therefore, have unanimously recommended, after consultation with some of the officials of the Departments, the amendments of the existing statute which are now before the amendments of the existing statute which are now before the committee. Now, Mr. Chairman, if no gentleman desires to make any inquiry respecting the matter I will move that the

Mr. HUNTER. I desire to ask the gentleman whether this bill provides for the additional officers or inspectors who are to act for the Government in connection with the parties who propose to furnish these supplies?

Mr. DINGLEY. It simply provides that one person shall be who has charge of the business there, and that he shall represent the Department. The design is to have a board consisting of one representative from each Department.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The bill creates no new office ?

Mr. DINGLEY. It creates no new office.
Mr. HUNTER. There is already a person designated in each Department to look after these supplies now, is there not?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; and that person will probably be the person designated to represent the Department if this bill shall

Mr. DINGLEY, Yes, sir.
Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise for the purpose of debating this bill, but for the purpose of making a single remark on another topic. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HUNTER] introduced a resolution expressing the sentiment of the House in regard to the appalling assassination of the mayor of the city of Chicago. I sympathize with that resolution, and heartily approve it; and I want to call the attention of Congress and the country to the fact that this assassin is undoubtedly insane; that his name indicates he is a foreigner, and very likely when he landed on these shores he was insane. The European govern-ments are emptying their insane and their paupers and criminals upon this country. The section of the country I represent is overrun with expert foreign criminals, housebreakers, and thieves, and the State's prison and penal institutions of Massachusetts and New England are crowded with them; and I wish to call attention of Congress and the country to the necessity of additional legislation for the restriction of this dangerous class additional legislation for the restriction of this dangerous class of immigration and the necessity of enforcing existing laws for the exclusion of criminals, lunatics, paupers, and idiots, a far worse class than the comparatively harmless Chinese we have voted to exclude. Why, Mr. Chairman, it is only a few years since the streets of Chicago ran red with the blood of policemen and officers of the law, murdered in the discharge of duty, and their blood cries to heaven. I think it is important that attention should be called to this matter here and now, in view of the arreling arise which has again just agreeted the attention. awful appalling crime which has again just arrested the attention of the country at Chicago.

I call the attention of Congress and the country to the alarming increase of the awful crime of train-wrecking and attempts at wrecking by expert criminals who have largely avoided apprehension; and I call attention to the fact that nearly every one of the persons who has been apprehended is a foreigner, and I have no doubt most of them are hardened criminals and graduates from the jails and prisons of Europe.

This crime was unknown among the American people until European countries began to dump their jail birds and ticket-of-leave men on these shores. The vilest wretch that curses the face of the earth is a train-wrecker. I am opposed to mob or lynch law, but if ever there was a case that justified it it is the crime of these wretches, who are lost to pity, and who put in jeopardy the life and limb of men, women, and children in the flying railroad train. I say I am op-posed to lynch law, but I would be glad to vote for a national and State law that would punish this crime or any attempt at it by execution one week after conviction.

As a Representative of Massachusetts I stand in my place and demand not only the enforcement of existing laws, as I have said, but more radical and stringent law for the exclusion of the classes which I have recited.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee rise and report the bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to. The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MONTGOMERY reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4292) to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to contracts for supplies in the Departments at Washington, had directed him to report back the

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DINGLEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that the original bill, House bill No. 4248, for which the bill just passed was reported as a substitute, be laid on the table.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 34) providing for the disposition of certain personal property and money now in the hands of a receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, appointed by the supreme court of Utah, and authorizing its application to the charitable purposes of said church; and

On October 28, 1893: Joint resolution (H. Res. 66) that the acknowledgments of the Government and people of the United States be tendered to various foreign governments of the world who have participated in commemoration of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 55) for the reporting, marking, and removal of derelicts:

A bill (H. R. 1986) to amend section 6 of the act approved March A bill (H. R. 1888) to amend section of the act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes;" and A bill (H. R. 3421) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for the New England coast.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted on its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fis-cal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes; had agreed to the conference asked by the House, and had appointed Mr. Cockrell, Mr. Gorman, and Mr. Cullom as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONGRESSIONAL ELECTION IN EIGHTH DISTRICT OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. WEADOCK. I present to the House, as a question of privilege, the memorial of Mr. Youmans, asking that the Congressional election in the Eighth district of Michigan be inquired into; and in connection with this memorial I present a resolution, which I move be referred to the Committee on Elec-

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I renew my point that this memorial and resolution do not, under the rules of the House, present a privileged matter, but should be referred through the petition box, as provided by the rule, to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. WEADOCK. Let the resolution be read.
Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am well aware of the provisions of the Constitution that "each House shall be the judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members." That is a power granted to this House; but it is a power which has been exercised when the sitting member was sworn in and qualified as one of the members of the present Congress.

Now, the law has provided how the title of a sitting member to a seat in this House may be attacked; and the contestant in this case, Mr. Youmans, who comes forward with this memorial, has not followed the provisions of the statute in this respect. submit there is no warrant in law for him to come in in the manner now proposed and bring this memorial as a privileged matter before the House The Speaker the other day referred to the case of Mr. Butterworth, which occurred in the Forty-sixth Congress, but I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that that was a matter which was brought up on the first day of the session of the ter which was brought up on the first day of the session of the Forty-sixth Congress, when there were no rules at all and no committees; and although that resolution was brought in as a matter of the highest privilege, there was, even in that case, no rule established. After a running debate, in which many members engaged, it was finally agreed what the mode of procedure should be in that case, and by agreement a special committee was appointed to investigate the alloged (rands that were above). was appointed to investigate the alleged frauds that were charged in the memorial.

Now, what is this case? Here is a case which comes up after this Congress has been in session for three months. It is not like the case from Cincinnati, where a memorial was presented like the case from Cincinnati, where a memorial was presented by the electors of two Congressional districts claiming that grave frauds had been committed. This is a memorial brought here by the defeated candidate for Congress in the Eighth district of Michigan. He then knew all the charges embraced in this memorial, and knew the manner prescribed by the statute in which he could contest the right of Mr. Linton to a seat on this floor. He neglected to exercise his rights; and I claim, Mr. Speaker, that under well-recognized principles of law, his neglect to exercise the rights as defined by the statute will now deprive him of any privilege in this House.

As a further reason, I submit that at the present time this House has adopted a code of rules; and Rule XXII of that code provides that memorials may be delivered to the Clerk, the member presenting them indorsing his name thereon, and shall then be referred to the appropriate committee for action. Now we have provided for a Committee of Elections, a committee clothed with ample power to investigate all contested questions that may be presented to Congress by defeated candidates for Congress in any State of the Union. And the most this claimant can do will be to simply follow the rules of the House and present his memorial through the petition box and let it go to the Committee on Elections, and that committee is clothed with authority and power to present the matter to the House if in the judgment of the committee there is reason for it.

Now, the fact, if the Speaker please, that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members is simply a power with which it is clothed. The statute that has been provided shows how that power shall be exercised; and inasmuch as this memorialist has neglected to follow the manner prescribed by the law he is deprived of any privilege or right other than that which would be conferred upon him by the ordinary usage as prescribed by the rules for all me-

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House all memorials, petitions, and private bills may be introduced and referred to the various committees by handing them to the Clerk. If it be a public bill it is introduced by handing it to the Speaker or to Clerk at the Speaker's table. Any memorial or resolution relating to the right of a member to his seat is a privileged matter. Any matter that is privileged may be presented or called up when no matter of a higher privilege is before the House. For instance, a committee not authorized to report at any time can only report when the committees are called for reports. committee authorized to report at any time need not necessarily report when the committees are called for reports, but it may make its report, as was done by the gentleman from Maine this make its report, as was done by the gentleman from Maine this morning, by presenting it at any time as a privileged matter. Now, the Chair is of the opinion that any matter relating to the right of a member to his seatis privileged. It has always been so held. Therefore the Chair does not think it is necessary to present a memorial of that character through the Clerk. The question raised here, the one presented by the pending proposition, is whether it is in the power of the House, on objection being made, to proceed to consider the resolution, or whether the point being made the whole matter must be referred to the Committee on Elections under the rules.

The Chair believes, when a matter of this sort is presented and the point of order is made against it, that it should be re-ferred to the committee having jurisdiction of the matter under ferred to the committee having jurisdiction of the matter under the rules of the House, it must be so referred. There is a de-cision made by the immediate predecessor of the present occu-pant of the chair which is in conflict with that opinion—the Arkansas case in the Fifty-first Congress. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] presented a resolution relating to the investi-gation of the election in Arkansas, and called it up for consider-ation.

The present occupant of the chair objected and made the point that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Elections, because, under the rules of the House (although the entire rules had not been adopted and there had been adopted a part of the rules relating to the committees and their jurisdiction) the question presented relating to the right of a member to his seat it must be referred to the Committee on Elections, which had jurisdiction of such questions. It was held by the then presiding officer—I have the decision before me—that as it related to the privileges of the House it need not be referred to the committee, and the House adopted the resolution.

The present occupant of the chair thinks that the provision of the rule is the wiser one, which requires that all matters re-lating to the right of a member to his seat should be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Any member has a right to present such a memorial as a privileged matter, but when the point is made it must be referred to the Committee on Elections.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Under the ruling of the Chair this goes to the Committee on Elections?

The SPEAKER. If the point is made it will have to go. Mr. WEADOCK. My motion was to refer the whole matter to the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the memorial of Henry M. Youmans, an elector residing in the Eighth Congressional district of the State of Michigan, touching the election of William S. Linton as a member of the House of Representatives, to represent said district in this House, be referred to the Committee on Elections, which committee shall consider the allegation therein made, and, as speedily as possible, report to the House what action should be taken with reference thereto.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The point of order is made, Mr. Speaker, that this matter must go to the Committee on Elec-

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered on the passage of the resolution, and also the vote by which the previous question was ordered, and that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Banking and Currency. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The committees were called for reports, when bills of the fol-lowing titles were severally presented, and, with the accompany-ing reports, ordered to be printed, and referred to the calendars named below:

AMERICAN REGISTRY OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

By Mr. FITHIAN, from the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, a bill (H. R. 2655) for the free admission to American registry of ships built in foreign countries—to the House Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that as to that bill there will be a minority report. I do not know whether any of the members of the committee are here or not—
Mr. FITHIAN. No one asked leave to present a minority report at the meeting of the committee; but if it is desired, there is no objection to it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask that, if the minority desire to submit their views, they may have leave to do so?

The SPEAKER. If the minority desire to submit their views, they will have the privilege, without objection.

There was no objection.

MILLE LAC INDIAN RESERVATION.

By Mr. HALL of Minnesota, from the Committee on Public Lands: Joint resolution (H. Res. 31) for the protection of those parties who have heretofore been allowed to make entries for lands within the former Mille Lac Indian Reservation, Minn. to the Union Calendar.

ADDITIONAL ASSOCIATE JUSTICES, OKLAHOMA.

By Mr. BRODERICK, from the Committee on the Judiciary: A bill (H. R. 288) to provide for three additional justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes-to the Union Calendar.

MORTGAGE DEBTORS.

By Mr. OATES, from the Committee on the Judiciary (adversely): A bill (H. R. 3436) for the relief of certain mortgage debtors, and for other purposes; ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees for The morning hour begins at ten minutes before 1 reports.

The Committee on Public Lands has a matter before the House, in Committee of the Whole. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GRESHAM] had charge of the matter. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4248) granting the right of way for the construction of a rail-road and other improvements over and on the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark.

On motion of Mr. GRESHAM the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of this bill, with Mr. OATES in the chair.

Mr. GRESHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that general debate be now closed, and that the bill be read by sections.

thing that can be done.

Mr. RAY. I am advised by the gentleman in charge of the bill that all these amendments I desire to offer will be accepted by the committee.

Mr. KAY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRESHAM. There is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill by sections was resumed and concluded.

Mr. GRESHAM. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill, as amended, to the House, with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OATES, chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements over and on the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark., and had directed him to report the same to the House with amendments, and with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RAY. I now move to amend the title of the bill as suggested by the amendment.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read:

A bill granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements over and in the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark.

On motion of Mr. GRESHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FEES OF THE CLERK OF THE UNITED STATES COURT FOR THE INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. CULBERSON (when the Committee on the Judiciary was called). Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4186) to regulate the fees of the clerk of the United States court for the Indian

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where the clerk of the United States court for the Indian Territory is authorized or required to perform duties other than those performed by the clerks of the district and circuit courts of the United States, he shall be entitled to receive and retain for his own use and benefit such fees as may be allowed by law for such services.

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield the floor to the gentleman from

Texas [Mr. BAILEY]

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, in the amendment to the law creating the court for the Indian Territory the clerk of that court is made a recorder of deeds and mortgages, is authorized to issue marriage licenses, and to perform marriage ceremonies. The law which imposes upon him these duties provides that he shall receive the same fees for their performance as are paid to the officers of the State of Arkaness for the performance of sim-ilar duties. It is the opinion of the judge of the court that un-der this provision of law the clerk is entitled to receive the fees and retain them.

It is also the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on It is also the opinion of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, and, if my opinion were worth anything, I would say I am clearly of the same opinion; but the Comptroller, in the exercise of the discretion vested in him, while admitting that it is a hardship to require this additional labor of the clerk, and also admitting that the law is not clear, thinks h is not at liberty to allow these fees. To meet this case I introduced the bill. I will detain the House only long enough to state that there is no clerk of the Federal courts in America who represent more service than does this clerk in the ordinary. performs more service than does this clerk in the ordinary transactions of this court.

I believe he is entitled to these fees under the law as it now stands, but I have thought it best to introduce this bill in order to save a tedious lawsuit in the Court of Claims. The provisions of the bill are so plainly just that I assume there will be no objection to it, and if no gentleman desires to discuss it, I will ask for a vote.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time: and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the time, and

Mr. DINGLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARGES TO JURIES IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 1956) to require judges of the courts of the United States to conform to the laws of the several States in delivering charges to juries.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the judges of the courts of the United States shall conform to the laws of the State in which they may be sitting, in giving instructions and delivering charges to juries in both civil and criminal cases.

An amendment recommended by the committee was read, inscring after the words "sitting," in line 4, the words "regulating the practice."

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana

Mr. BOATNER.
Mr. BOATNER.
Mr. Speaker, this is the same bill which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary at the first session of the last Congress and was passed by the House, except that it is here amended so as to provide that the judges shall conform to the law of the State in which they may be sitting, "regulating the practice" in giving instructions and delivering charges to juries in both civil and criminal cases. The object is to make the practice in the Federal courts conform to the practice required by the laws in the States in which the judges may be sitting so as to secure certainty in the charges delivered to the juries, to prevent the judges of the United States courts from transcending the laws of the States in giving charges and instructions to juries. There was no controversy about the bill last year, and I suppose there will be none now. Mr. BOATNER last year, and I suppose there will be none now.

Mr. OATES. Let me ask the gentleman whether he is certain that that bill was not passed in his absence? Every bill that the committee had on the calendar except one was passed.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have made inquiry at the Clerk's desk and am informed that this bill has not been passed.

Mr. BOATNER. I am informed that it has not been passed. I call for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULBERSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SECTION 5391 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 3981) to amend section 5391 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5391 of the Revised Statutes be amended so

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5391 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"If any offense be committed in any place, jurisdiction over which has been retained by the United States or ceded to it by a State, or which has been purchased with the consent of a State for the erection of a fort, magazine, arsenal, dockyard, or other needful building, the punishment for which fefense is not provided for by any law of the United States, such offense shall, upon conviction in a circuit or district court of the United States for the district in which it was committed, be liable to and receive the same punishment as the existing laws of the State in which such place is situated provide for the like offense when committed within the jurisdiction of such State; and no subsequent repeal of any such State law shall affect any such State law shall affect any such Prosecution."

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is substantially a reenactment, with slight changes in the phraseology, of section 5391 of the Revised Statutes passed April 5, 1866. It simply adopts the law of the respective States in which reservations exist over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction.
Last fall an indictment was found against certain parties for an aggravated assault or riot committed in the reservation known as Fort Logan, in the State of Colorado. A motion to quash the indictment was made, and was sustained by the court, on the ground that the law having been enacted prior to the admission of that State into the Union, it did not apply to Colorado, on Montana, or certain other new Western States, and this proposed reënactment is simply for the purpose of applying it to the States that have been admitted into the Union since the passage of the original act. The bill has been submitted to and is recommended by the Secretary of War and the Attorney General

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.
As I introduced the bill it contained the words "existing law," and I notice that the committee propose to strike out the word "existing" and to insert the words "now in force"?
Mr. LAYTON. Yes, sir.
Mr. OUTHWAITE. Suppose that after the passage of this bill a State should change its law with regard to any of these minor offenses, will not the expression which the committee proposes apply to the law at the time of the passage of this bill and fail to reach a case where the State has changed its law after the passage of the bill?

Mr. LAYTON. That will be the effect, and that was well understood by the committee.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But if the words "existing law" were

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But if the words "existing law" were retained would they not cover a case where the State changed its law after the passage of this act?

Mr. LAYTON. They would; but the committee thought it was not wise to put in that provision because we do not know what the laws of the States may be in this respect. In case of changes in the laws it will simply be necessary to reduce this statute from time to time. Mr. Chairman, if there is no desire for further discussion I move the adoption of the amendments.

The amendments of the committee were agreed to. The bill as

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H.R. 3299) to amend the naturalization laws of the United States. The bill was read, as follows:

A bill to amend the naturalization laws of the United States.

A bill to amend the naturalization laws of the United States.

Be il enacted, etc., That no alien who has ever been convicted of a felony of other infamous crime, or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, or who is an anarchist or polygamist, or who immigrated to the United States in violation of any of the laws thereof, or who can not read the Constitution of the United States shall be naturalized or adjudged by any court to be a citizen of the United States or of any State; nor shall any alien be naturalized who has not continuously for five years next preceding his application resided within the United States, and for the last preceding twelve months within the State, district, or Territory in which the application is made. No class of aliens who are ineligible to naturalization by cristing law shall be rendered eligible by this act, except as herein provided. SEC. 3. That upon filing a petition and declaration in the form and verified in the manner provided in the preceding section with the clerk of any court having jurisdiction of the naturalization of aliens, such clerk shall enter the same upon a docket to be kept for that purpose, and give notice in writing to the district attorney, solicitor, or public prosecutor, whose duty is is to represent the United States. State, District, or Territory in such court; and such petition shall be heard and tried by the court in preference to other causes; and upon such hearing the United States shall be represented by the district attorney or his assistant, and if in a State court the State may be represented by the United States district attorney or State's attorney, prosecutor, or solicitor, whose duty it shall be to defend the Government against such petition and to see that the allegations thereof are fully proven. If upon such hearing the court is satisfied from all the evidence that the allegations of the petition are true and that the petitioner is good moral character and a fit and proper purson, according to law, to become a citizen of the United States, such court shall render judgment accordingly; but if the court is not satisfied from the evidence that the petitioner is entitled to the relief sought, the petition shall be dismissed, all of which shall be entered of record in said court. All legal evidence, or all and written, shall be received and considered by the court, but the petitioner shall in no case be admitted to citizenship upon hisown uncorroborated evidence; but the corroboration shall not be required to extend to any period of time or acts and facts anterior to the residence of such petitioner within the United States. The petitioner shall pay the cost of the proceeding, and thereupon shall be entitled to a copy of the judgment, or decree of the court, properly certified, with the seal of the court attached, which shall be evidence of the contents thereof in any court or tribunal, State or Federal, throughout the United States.

Sec. 4. That any petitioner for naturalization who shall knowingly swear falsely in respect to any material matter or thing alleged in his petition, or which is in issue upon the hearing thereof, and any person who shall knowingly swear falsely as to any material matter or thing on the hearing of any such petition, or in relation to any materise on the connected therewith, shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and upon conviction thereof before any court having jurisdiction under this act shall be imprisoned at hard labor not exceeding five years, and may be fined not exceeding $1,000, one or both, in the discretion of the court trying the same.

Sec. 5. That the district and circuit courts of the United States and the highest original common-law jurisdiction, being the next highest courts of record to the supreme courts of the Territories and the State courts of the instruction of the naturalization of aliens.

Sec. 6. That no alien who has filed his declaration of intention to become actitizen of the United States nor other person who has acquired rights under existing law to that end shall inanywise be affected by this act.

Sec. 7. That any alien who is eligible to be naturalized under the provisions of this act, except as to residence of five years and ability to read the Constitution of the United States, shall by making affidavit to his eligibility and of his intention to become actitizen of the United States, thereupon been titled to the benefits of the homestead law, but no patent to said homestead land shall issue to such alien homestead law, but no patent to said homestead land shall issue to such

Mr. CULBERSON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, before I proceed I would like to know how much of this hour remains.

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to inquire whether it is proposed to call for a vote during this morning hour?

Mr. CULBERSON. As I understand the rule, we have now the balance of this hour and also an hour to-morrow. We propose to ask a vote on the bill to-morrow, if that be the pleasure of the House. Mr. SPRINGER. You do not propose to insist on a vote to-

Mr. CULBERSON. No, sir.
Mr. OATES. We will vote to-day, if we get ready.
Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I do not think you will get ready.
Mr. SPRINGER. If you are going to allow any discussion against the bill there are some very important objections to the measure which will be stated.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill: If gentlemen will give me their careful attention I will endeavor to explain as clearly as I possibly can its provisions and the necessity for its enactment. I will ask for the reading of the report of the committee when I have indulged in a few remarks by way of explanation.

Our naturalization laws are exceedingly loose and uncertain, and subject to abuse, especially in the matter of negligence on the part of a great many of the courts which now under the law have the right to naturalize aliens. Gentlemen will find mentioned in the report some of the many abuses in the administra-tion of the courts in respect to naturalization.

The first question which we should consider is this: Is it worth anything to be an American citizen? Should there be any formalities about it? If there should be, then they ought to partake of a certain solemnity, and the law should require inquiries to be made so that the courts may know and the public may realize that any alien who is declared to be a citizen is worthy of the honor. I have been a member of committees which have for years past investigated both the question of immigration and the vio-lation of the naturalization laws; and great volumes of testimony have been reported touching both these questions, volumes which are accessible to every member.

The greatest abuses have grown out of the fact that under our present law an alien may readily declare his intention to become a citizen; and in most of the States he is at once endowed with all or very nearly all of the privileges of acitizen. And in many cases persons who have thus declared their intention, neglect to take out final papers of naturalization. A few years ago we had a heated contest in this Hall over the eligibility of a member from the State of Indiana who when he came to this country many years before declared his intention; and the question was whether he was eligible in the absence of naturalization papers, or if he ever did go through the final process necessary to obtain

This question is shown to be one of vast importance in another respect. Our Government during a period of a good many years has been in many cases involved in controversies through our State Department with foreign governments as to the status of aliens who have been here and become partially naturalized.

This bill is not all I would like it to be. It is usual for the courts of the United States alone to be required to enforce the laws of the United States; and the first bill of this character I ever introduced here committed the power of naturalization to the Federal courts alone. But the Committee on the Judiciary, which has considered this measure not only in this Congress but in several previous ones, concluded that for the convenience of aliens who frequently reside many miles from where there is any United States court, it would be better to embrace in the provisions of the bill several of the State courts, deeming their action perfectly safe and reliable.

The provision of the bill in that respect is a restriction. commits that power to the courts of the United States and to a sufficient number of State courts of record—courts next highest to the courts of appeal—courts which have a clerk and a seal. It is believed that no one will be inconvenienced by this change, and yet it is considered safe. In some of the State courts that have been intrusted with this jurisdiction some subordinate officer has gone forward with the process of naturalization even in the absence of the judge.

Yes; citizens have been ground out at the rate Mr. MORSE.

of two a minute.

Mr. OATES. Why, sir, in the gentleman's own State, the State of Massachusetts, some years ago it was so easy a matter to obtain naturalization and there were so many aliens seeking naturalization and so many abuses connected with the proceeding that the Legislature of that State enacted laws regulating the proceedings of the State courts in that respect so as to require identification and also proper proof that the applicant was the kind of a man who ought to be naturalized. That law caused the great bulk of applicants to abandon the State courts and seek the United States courts.

It is in proof, as cited in the report, that in some cases the clerks of the court or perhaps the deputy clerks, in the absence of the judge, have taken aliens in droves of ten and conducted them with the witnesses and papers to the door of the court room where the officer would say: "Consider yourselves in the presence of the court;" he would then admister the formal oath and issue the naturalization papers, although no judge was there and no court was open. One of your committees developed the fact that in one of the courts in the city of Brooklyn there existed—without fault on the part of the judge, for he knew nothing about it as the matter was carried on through one of his subordinates— a sort of secret organization engaged in the business of making citizens for pay; having control of the seal of the court and the forms of certificates this organization would for $25 make any man a full-fledged American citizen three days after he had arrived in this country.

Mr. MORSE. Even if he had Asiatic cholera.
Mr. EVERETT. Will my distinguished friend from Alabama allow me to interrupt him for a question just there?

Mr. OATES. With much pleasure.
Mr. EVERETT. As the report alludes to these practices taking place in the city of Boston, I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any evidence that such things occurred while Judge Lowell was on the bench?

Mr. OATES. No, sir; we had no evidence that they did. We had one judge, whose name is mentioned, Judge Nelson, before the committee

Mr. EVERETT. I have reason to believe that in Judge Lowell's time nothing of that sort was allowed.

Mr. OATES. We have no evidence touching anything done in Judge Lowell's time.

Now, sir, this abuse has grown out of the provision of the law which allows this declaration of intention on the part of the alien. Hence this is a bill to reach that evil and provide a remedy for it. It provides, not with reference to any case already begun, because they are excepted and will be governed by the resent law; this is to have no retroactive effect whatever, it provides that five years' residence and good behavior in this country shall be necessary to entitle anyone to naturalization. As it is now they can declare their intention to become naturalized and reside the period required by law, then go through the process to obtain full naturalization papers. There is nothing under the present law regarding the right of Government to defend a case when such application is presented.

The alien applicant comes before the court or judge and says he wishes to take out his papers; they are formally made up, and the judge usually signs them without anything except the mere formal examination of the affidavits presented. There is no close scrutiny of each case as it arises. This bill provides that a man after he has resided for five years and shall have filed a petition in proper form, setting forth his claims, under the provisions of the bill, in a court having jurisdiction, the place of his nativity, where his former residence was, his residence in this country, that he has resided here for five years, and in the State or district prior to the filing of the petition for one year; that he is not an anarchist or a polygamist, and has never been convicted of a felonious offense, or any crime involving moral turpitude, and when that is done the United States district attorney, if it be in a United States court, shall be notified by the clerk and shall deny the allegations so as to make it incumbent on the applicant to produce proof. He makes his proof, and then on the applicant to pass on the question. If the proof, and then the judge is to pass on the question. If the proof is sufficient and satisfies his mind, he makes an order or decree admitting him to naturalization, and there is an end of it, while such degree is prima facie evidence of the fact of his naturalization in all the courts of the country.

If the papers be filed in a State court having jurisdiction, it is likewise the duty of the clerk to notify the prosecuting attorney of that court, who shall appear and deny the allegations contained in the petition and represent the Government to the extent of requiring a sufficient amount of proof, which must be produced to entitle the applicant to a decree or judgment of naturalization.

The petition is required not only to set forth the things that I have named, but also to describe his present location or residence. That would involve, if it be in a city, the giving of his number, street, etc., so that he may be identified. In other words this provision of the bill is to prevent fraud or imposition, and at the same time allow every worthy alien to be admitted to American citizenship. At the same time it excludes all those who are not entitled to citizenship, and prevents them from imposing on the courts or obtaining the benefit of citizenship contrary to the law or when they are not entitled thereto.

Now, sir, there is another provision which I would like to have incorporated in the bill. I did introduce a bill containing it in a former Congress, but it met with some opposition, and might meet with it in this case, and hence it was omitted. It is this: Before I introduced that bill I conferred with Mr. Bayard, the he was Secretary of State, as to this provision, and it fully met with his approval. It was a section which required the court, the section of the sect when it admitted to naturalization, to send a certification of the fact to the State Department, where it should be filed for future use and in aid to the State Department. The reason why it met with objection was that it involved some additional expense. Bayard, however, estimated that it would not require the services of more than three additional clerks. I am still in favor of that provision, although it is not embodied in this bill.

Mr. MORSE. It ought to be all the same.

Mr. MORSE. It ought to be all the same.
Mr. OATES. It may be offered when the bill is open to amend-

Now, sir, some gentlemen I have met and conversed with on this subject seem to oppose the bill because they thought it this subject seem to oppose the bill because they thought it would have a deleterious effect on the elections, and would obstruct the right of aliens to vote. It will not by any of its provisions (and that is referred to in the report), because the right to vote is conferred by the laws of the State in which a man resides. In my own State, under the provisions of the constitution, an alien who has declared his intention to become a citizen. and who has resided there for twelve months, can vote and hold some offices.

There are other States with similar provisions; while I think a great many of the States, in fact I know it, provide by law that a voter must be a citizen. It is all, however, a matter of State regulation as to who shall vote, and the States can do as they like about that. But the practice of imposing on the court to obtain naturalization, and in some places a practice participated in by political parties (according to my information all political parties), when elections are impending, of mustering up great crowds and hordes of these foreigners, and many of these too ignorant to know even who the President of the United States and running them through some sort of a naturalization mill, and taking them like dumb driven cattle to the polls and voting them, is something which ought not to be tolerated in this great American Republic of ours. [Applause.] I noticed in the New York papers a few days ago an account of an instance where some practices of this kind are being indulged in. Questions were put to some of these men seeking to qualify themselves as voters, on the one side or the other, according to the hands they fall into and the amount they receive, and actually one of them stated that George Washington was now the President of the United States. [Laughter.] Mr. BLAIR. How long had these men been in this country?

Mr. OATES. The most of them will be found to have come over very recently. Now, practices of this kind, whether indulged in by my own party or a party opposed to it, are wrong. We ought to rise above that, and so far as Congress has power in the premises we ought to remedy it.

That is the effort which is made in this law, not to regulate or qualify voters, but to raise the standard of citizenship for these aliens and require them to come forward after residing here a sufficient period of time, and to present a case to the courts, sustained by credible testimony, which will show that the applicant is worthy of this great boon of American citizenship. When that is done it will have at least a moral influence, if not a direct one, upon the practices in our States of prematurely manufacturing voters out of aliens who are utterly ignorant of the questions upon which they have to vote.

In addition to this bill having no retroactive effect, there is a provision in it of a humanitarian and proper character, that all Indians who have severed their tribal relations and who attain to a degree of intelligence that makes them worthy may be naturalized as citizens of the United States.

There is also a provision that any alien who comes to this country and desires to engage in the industry of tilling the soil, who desires to take a home under the homestead laws on the public land and to engage in farming, may make his declaration of intention as a part of his application to the Land Office and receive his homestead, and then when he settles upon it and cultivates it for five years, as our own citizens are required to do before they can get title, if at the expiration of that time he obtains his citizenship by being naturalized, having resided on the land for five years, he gets the title to his homestead.

Mr. GOLDZIER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Under this law, suppose a farmer takes up his residence, files his declaration of intention, and resides on his homestead for five years, but during that time has not learned enough of the English language to read the Constitution of the United States, what becomes of his homestead and of his title?

Mr. OATES. I thank the gentleman for his inquiry. It is provided in the bill that one of the qualifications for citizenship shall be that the applicant must be able to read the Constitution. Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. GOLDZIER] makes a very perit does not meet the case. The language of the must be able to read it in the English tinent inquiry. the bill is no language, but wat he must be able to read it. If he can read it in German, or in his native language, that would be a compliance with the law, and it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there ought to be some sort of educational qualification for a man to become a citizen of the United States.

That is about as low a standard as we can fix. It does not say that he shall read the entire instrument before the court, but he must show to the court that he is able to read it. That would be shown if he could read a part of it in any language, so that he could understand it.

The Constitution of the United States, as all men know, is that instrument which brought into life and still maintains this great We have frequent controversies and dis-Government of ours. agreements about what different clauses of that instrument mean, but all will concede the importance of it, and that it is the foundation of our Government.

While some contend for a latitudinous construction and others for a strict one, no one would abolish it; and is it not important that every citizen should for himself be able to read it, even though he may not be able to read it as a statesman or a professor might read it, yet that he should be able to read it in some language, so that he would have some idea of the fundamental law of the country which he is willing to adopt as his own? He required to take an oath to support that instrument, and yet if he is unable to read it it is not to be expected that he, like the native American, who, though ignorant of books, is taught by tradition from his cradle up to revere that instrument and pro-

Mr. HAUGEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question. Mr. OATES.

Certainly.

Mr. HAUGEN. I understand from the gentleman's statement that a man who had declared his intention at the land office in applying for a homestead, and who had lived upon his land for five years and cultivated it, would still lose it unless he was able at the time of applying for his final papers, to read the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. OATES. The bill does not say—

Mr. HAUGEN (continuing). If that is so, and I infer from the gentleman's remarks that it is so, would it not be better to apply this reading test at the time that the man declares his in-

I do not know about that, Mr. Speaker. Mr. OATES. it is more charitable that the law should allow him five years in which to learn to read the Constitution; and if he does not learn it in five years he must, indeed, be a very dull scholar.

Mr. HAUGEN. That would depend somewhat upon the age of the applicant.

Mr. OATES. I think any man young enough to open a farm and cultivate it successfully would be young enough in five years to learn to read the Constitution in some language.

be filed two years before the naturalization papers are taken out.

Mr. OATES. Yes. Mr. HAUGEN. At present the declaration of intention must

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, under this bill, what do you do with those who have declared their intention before it takes effect? Mr. OATES. The bill provides that its provisions shall not isting law. No part of the bill has a retroactive effect.

The SPEAKER. The hour has expired. The Clerk will report the special order.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bankruptcy bill. The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OUTHWAITE in the

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of a bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The title was again reported.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, as the bill under consideration has been so ably and elaborately discussed in detail and in all its phases and relations to commerce should it become law, In all its phases and relations to commerce should it become law, I shall content myself with stating briefly what appears to me a valid objection to section 2, which is intended to fix and establish the "acts of bankruptcy." But before doing so I want to say a few words concerning bankuptcy legislation generally.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], in opening this debate, spoke of the progress made during the present century in abolishing imprisonment for debt and in granting exemptions from execution and establishing stay laws for the security and protection of debtors. I heartily agree with everything the gentleman said on this line. Every true American feels an especial pride in the part performed by his country in abrogating and forever setting aside the harsh and inhuman rules of law which formerly existed for the collection of debts, and which had been harded down from the less enlightened ages. But I had been handed down from the less enlightened ages. But I fear, instead of advancing, if this bill is enacted into law without amendment it will tend to hamper and embarrass, rather than benefit, a large class of honest debtors.

I have never been convinced that national bankruptcy legislation is good for the country except in extraordinary times and under conditions which can only result from great national disasters. These conditions generally arise from war, pestilence, or some great financial disturbance. At such times it has been assumed by Congress that the States were not able to give the full measure of relief required by commercial conditions and by unfortunate debtors. And out of these causes and considera-tions have been produced three national bankruptcy laws.

While in the enactment of this legislateon the object has always been to relieve both debtor and creditor, yet I question very much if any bankrupt law ever enacted in this country has accomplished any substantial good. Under each act passed grave abuses and vicious practices became the rule. The most violent abuses and victous practices became the rule. The most violent opposition was aroused. All classes soon became dissatisfied and with one voice demanded repeal. This supports the conclusion of the present day that all bankruptcy legislation in the past history of the country has been a conspicuous failure. It has been of no benefit either to the debtor or his creditors. Instead of relieving and aiding the business classes it constantly tended to their annoyance and embarrassment. The officers appointed and charged with the custody and disposition of the estates were doubtless as honest and competent as other people, but because doubtless as honest and competent as other people, but because the law became a reproach nearly every official connected with it or charged with its administration was regarded with suspi-

It is said that the bankruptcy system originated with the Romans, and that it at first required substantially that a debtor who was unable to pay might "yield up" all his property to his creditors and be secured against being dragged to jail by violence. This ancient origin entitles it to consideration, but I submit that instead of the system being improved it seems to have been degenerating, for under any national law we have had while the debtor constructively ceded his property to his creditors, as matter of fact he "yielded it up" to a register or other official, who had to dispose of the goods, often at great sacrifice, so that when the cost of proceeding and charges were satisfied there was little left for distribution among creditors. These enormous charges attending the settlement of estates have contributed more perhaps than any other defect to the sentiment against the system of legislation.

It is believed and contended here, however, that the waste and extravagance incident to the administration of former laws will be avoided by the proposed system. If gentlemen here did not believe that this would be so I apprehend that no one would be found supporting this bill, for all admit the weaknesses and vices inherent in all former laws on the subject.

There is no question as to the power of Congress to chacken uniform system of bankruptcy, but it is significant that during our entire national existence as a constitutional government this our entire national existence as a constitutional government this our entire national existence as a constitutional government this our entire national existence as a constitutional government this has only been done for about fourteen years. It is also significant that the several States of the Union which have enacted insolvency or assignment laws have retained them. These facts show the preferences of our people. The States from time to time, as experience warrants, amend their systems, but never abandon them.

Under these State insolvency acts, which constitute a system of voluntary bankruptcy, the estates are settled under the di-rection of the State courts by assignees appointed by the creditors. These courts are held in every county and within reach of all persons interested. They are the tribunals to which our people are accustomed in the transaction of their ordinary legal business and the ones to which they are most attached.

The Federal courts at best can only be held at a few places in each State. In the larger States, in many instances, these courts are held at great distances from the majority of the people. This is especially true in the West, where all the States are large and where but few of them have more than one Federal judicial district. Litigation in these courts is necessarily bur-densome and expensive, and the people avoid them as long as it is possible to do so.

While the national bankruptcy laws have been in force the State insolvency acts, so far as there was any conflict, have been suspended in their operation, but not abrogated, so that when the national law was repealed the State laws sprang into full force and effect. So far as I have been able to ascertain nearly all the States have insolvency or voluntary assignment acis under which estates can be equitably settled and with less ex-pense than under any bankruptcy law yet enacted. But it is ob-jected, first, that the several State laws are not uniform; and, second, that they are inadequate to grant discharges and give full and merited relief in all cases; that many of them fail absolutely to do equal justice in adjusting settlements between the insolvent debtor and his creditors.

While it is doubtless true that no State statute has been fram not subject to one or more of these criticisms, it is also true that no national law on this subject has been written upon the statute book which has not failed, or at least fallen short, of the object and purposes of its enactment. These national laws have been enacted and they have remained in force respectively one. two, and eleven years, and it can be truthfully said that no legislation in this country ever became more obnoxious to the whole people. And if this bill passes I have not the slightest doubt but that in a short time there will be a demand for its repeal.

But, believing that at this time there is a necessity for such measure to relieve to some extent the distress of the last few months, and if possible to provide for releasing from the bondage of debt many who will surely be the victims of the unjust and unAmerican legislation which is being forced through this Congress, I shall, if modifications are made, vote for the bill, but if compelled to vote upon it without amendment shall vote against it. We can not close our eyes to the fact that we have passed through a panic which has disturbed commercial interests and wrecked thousands of business men all over the country. We can not hope for better things until changed conditions are wrought out. There are doubtless many among the failures who should be given another chance; but this can not be done in all s under the State laws.

I am opposed to the involuntary features of this bill as reported because, in my judgment, if this were the law of the land it would be too easy to force men into bankruptcy. One-half of the retail business houses of the country would be in danger. From a careful and studious reading of section 2 of this proposed act it will be readily seen that it contains too much. The common mind can not understand it, and, if it passes, the courts will disagree as to its interpretation. If it were the law business people would have to watch by day and by night that something might not be done inadvertently to make them amenable to some of these provisions, and I fear that as to many dealers who are doing business on small capital bankruptcy might become the rule and insolvency the exception. I refer more especially to the second, fifth, sixth, minth, and tenth grounds or subdivisions.

Mr. BOATNER Can not the bill be amended to cover these

Mr. BRODERICK. I am coming to that question.

The section reads:

The section reads:

SEC. 2. a Acts of bankruptcy.—Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having within six months prior to the filing of a petition scalinst him (1) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors: (2) failed for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process then until three days before the time fixed for such sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale and until a petition is fied; (3) made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors; (4) made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts; (5) made while insolvent a contract personally, or by agent, for the purchase or sale of a commodity with intent not to receive or deliver the same but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and the market price thereof, at a time subsequent to the making of such contract; (6) made while insolvent a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference; (7) procured or suffered any insolvent and the market price thereof any of the property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself with linear to defeat his creditors; (8) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself and to defeat his creditors; (9) suffered while insolvent an execution for 5500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount against himself with intent to defeat his creditors; (a) the property of the

Here are nominally ten specific grounds or acts of bankruptcy, but in fact more. If the bill passes into law some of them would be fruitful sources of contention and litigation. Appeals would be taken from court to court until the entire system would undergo judicial construction, and during all this time waste and shrinkage of values would be inevitable.

A large proportion of the local dealers in every community depend to some extent on their credit, and instead of the pro-posed law helping this class it would be a constant source of alarm, embarrassment, and in some cases would result in hardships and disaster.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that before passing this bill there should be substituted for this objectionable section only three grounds for involuntary bankruptcy. First, actual fraud in contracting the debt or debts of creditors who seek to avail themselves of the provisions of the act; second, disposing of property by the debtor for the purpose of defrauding his creditors; third, departing from his place of business or domicile with intent to avoid the service of civil process and defraud his cred-

If these amendments are made, and such others as will make the system harmonious, it might result in some good, by way of relieving a class of debtors who have become hopelessly involved, and will be driven into liquidation. But I do not believe it possible for this Congress or any other to enact a bankruptcy law which would be satisfactory, and which would remain upon the statutes any considerable time. It requires too much machinery to execute such a law. So many and intricate are the obstacles in the way that they seem to be insuperable. They have challenged the ingenuity and skill of the greatest lawyers. It is not at all surprising that members of any committee of lawyers should disagree upon such a measure. In view of the difficulties, it would be a wonder if they should agree.

For these and other reasons I question very much if we should in any event try to make this a part of our permanent system of laws, but if enacted should provide that the law shall remain in force for three years. If at the expiration of this time it should be found just and equitable in its operation, it could be extended or reënacted.

As a member of the committee I have given this subject some study and have reached the conclusion that overreaching, or a mere failure to meet obligations when due, should not be grounds for adjudging one insolvent. There is no necessity for such a rule of law, and so far as I am able to ascertain there is no urgent demand for it.

The wholesale merchants have adopted the best possible methods for ascertaining the business, moral, and financial standing of their customers in every community. Imposition in bolstering up a failing business is now rarely practiced with success. ing up a failing business is now rarely practiced with success. There need be no loss to the wholesale people with the present facilities for doing business except through actual fraud or unavoidable misfortune. For the latter I am unwilling that the debtor should be forced into insolvency. For the former, that is, if the debtor has been guilty of fraud in procuring credit, or in endeavoring to defeat his creditors by fraudulent sales, or by concealing himself to avoid service of process, then he should be required to surrender his property, not exempt, for the benefit of all his creditors. And as to failing debtors residing in one State and doing business in another, they should be allowed an election between the exemption laws of the two States.

I have very little objection to the voluntary provisions of this bill, but shall not consent in any manner to a law by which men can be thrown into bankruptcy except for causes clearly contain-can be thrown into bankruptcy except for causes clearly containing the elements of actual fraud. Other causes or grounds would be subject to abuses and would result disastrously to business interests and bring reproach upon the law. [Applause.]

Mr. DRAPER Mr. Chairman, the few remarks that I shall make upon this bill are from a business rather than a legal stand-point. My knowledge of law has been gained by experience as a client rather than as counsel; and while I am aware that legal knowledge and ability are essential in framing statutes, I also know that statutes are or ought to be framed to meet the needs of the business community.

Now, insolvent or bankrupt legislation is, at certain times at least, one of the necessities of business life. All men, unfortunately, do not succeed in business. In fact a large share of those doing business, if not the majority, fail at some time or other during their commercial career. The statement of the eminent Boston merchant, Mr. Abbott Lawrence, that, after a business life of fifty years, he had found that thirteen out of fourteen men who had been associated with him commercially in his early days had at some time been insolvent is probably as true of the commercial classes to-day as it was then.

Now, in addition to other causes of bankruptcy, panics sweep over the land from time to time, leaving their paths strewn with commercial wrecks. When the number of insolvents doing or trying to do business reaches a certain percentage (I will not attempt to tell what that percentage is), some provision must be made for the settlement of the accumulated indebtedness and a fresh start, or the credit system itself will be substantially destroyed. Conservative business men will not sell except for cashdown when the goods they sell are liable to be seized as soon as delivered to pay old debts, and men who do take such risks must charge prices in accordance with the risk taken, and that brings about injury to the final consumer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, State laws can not and will not provide adequately for these troubles. They may provide for settlement with local creditors; but no State can discharge a debtor from an obligation entered into with a citizen of another State. For this purpose a national bankrupt law is a necessity, and it was considered by our fathers so important that special constitutions. considered by our fathers so important that special constitu-tional provision was made securing to Congress the power to pass such a law. Congress has taken advantage of this power two or three times in the past, and it is as certain that they will do it again as it is that the number of insolvents will increase with the lapse of time

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have read over this bill with some care, and I have also read the report of the committee, and have listened to most of the discussion thus far. I do not propose to discuss the legal points of the bill. As a business man I do not feel competent to do so; but I will leave them to be discussed by the eloquent legal gentlemen in this House on my side of the question. Outside of my own examination of the bill, I have the proposed on the specific property of the committee which have great confidence in the ability of the committee which has re ported it. It is made up from all sections of the country, and I know that this bill has been considered with more than ordinary care. I also am told that it has been submitted to most of or many of the commercial associations of the country, and that it has received their approval.

At this point I propose to read a report and memorial of the National Board of Trade on this subject, a report of a special committee appointed by the board to consider the Torrey bank-rupt bill. Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand it is not the Torrey bill that is before us, but it is substantially that bill, amended, as I am informed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Oates], in the direction of greater leniency toward insolvent debtors. This report says:

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE-TWENTY-SECOND ANNUAL SESSION.

NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE—TWENTY-SECOND ANNUAL SESSION.

Your committee finds a similarity between the present conditions which prevent honest unfortunates from securing relief and which obstruct commerce, both due to the fact that there is not a national backrupt law, and the condition of interstate commerce when bulk was broken at the crossing of State lines at great loss and unnecessary expense, and expresses the belief that the passage of such a law will promote the best interests of the people and of commerce, as the increase and extension of transportation facilities has done, in this, that it will enable such persons to secure relief, expedite the administration of estates, diminish dishonest acts, increase transactions on credit, and reduce the price of commodities to consumers.

The people of this country are for the most part honest in their transactions, but there are creditors and debtors who are unfortunately devoid of the sense of moral right; those who are so shortsighted as to be willing to commit wrongs as a temporary makeshift and those who feel constrained to perpetrate wrongs in order to perform a higher duty to their dependents which they believe justifies such wrongs. There can not be a diversity of opinion upon the proposition that there should be a law for the guidance of creditors and debtors who are without moral perception, for the perpetration of wrongs under the impulse of fancied right.

We have carefully examined the Torrey bill to see whether it meets the requirements as above, and find that it does, and that provisions are contained therein which are in harmonious relationship with the rest of the bill, providing as follows: For the allowance of State examptions to, and the discharge of, honest insolvents; the complete surrender of the assets of bankrupts; the strict accountability of officers; the prompt and inexpensive compromise or arbitration of controversies; the conducting of all procedings without secrecy; the prevention of the giving and receiving of preferences; the enfor ones; the pro rata distribution of the assets of bankrupts to creditors of the same class: the administration of estates quickly and cheaply, and the prompt and just realization of the rights of all parties by judicial process without in any respect modifying the methods of honest men.

If we were told to-day that a member of this body came from a State where it was the law that when a man was upon his deathbed his friends to whom he happened to be indebted came to selze and carry away his property instead of to console his family, we would accuse such member of tolerating a law unworthy of enforcement in the barbarous ages, and adisgrace to the enlightened nineteenth century. If we modify the statement so as to place the man, not upon a physical, but upon a financial deathbed, the accused member would, while pleading gulity, justly claim most of us as his brothers. In other words, the laws of most of the States are such that when a man becomes involved financially his creditors are compelled, in self-defense, to seize his property before the debtor secretes it in order to protect his dependents, or before some other creditor carries it away; as a result, these laws for the most part weaken the weak, encourage the dishonest, and make imperative the selfish struggle between the strong.

There should be a law such that men who honestly become unfortunate may have the conlidence of their creditors; a law so just that a debtor's family would be better protected under its provisions than by his wrong; doing: a law so comprehensive and wise in its provisions that the creditors would be served better financially by trusting to its administration than by invoking compulsory processes. After all, such processes are designed only as cruel weapons against the dishonest, instead of a just defining of the rights of honest creditors against the honest but unfortunate debtor. There should be a law which would enable the debtor to be honest and the creditor to be considerate; but there is none.

We have carefully examined the honest.

The committee therefore reaches the conclusion that the Torrey bill is a wise measure and ought to be enacted in the best interests of the people of every condition and in every part of the country.

It is recommended that an address to Congress be sent to the President of the Senate for presentation to the Senate, and to the Speaker, to be laid before the House of Representatives, as follows:

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The National Board of Trade, while holding its twenty-second annual sesion at the above time and place, respectfully states as follows: That its members represent the great body of the commercial toilers of the country, North, South, East, and West, and those who are dependent upon

Country, North, South, East, and West, and those who are country. North, South, East, and West, and those who are thereby becoming a debtor to many creditors in the several States, and as producers or distributors sell articles all over the country, each thereby becoming a creditor of many debtors; they are therefore interested in having a bankruptcy law passed by Congress which shall be fair to them as both debtors and craditors.

creditor of many debtors; they are therefore interested in having a bankruptcy law passed by Congress which shall be fair to them as both debtors and creditors.

That to successfully pursue a modern vocation is a complex problem; it not only involves good judgment and untiring industry on the part of the individual, so far as his capabilities are concerned, but as to the difficulties he has to encounter it involves conditions which he can not control. He must combat the ever-varying conditions and effects of seasons and climates, and in the end his capabilities have been exerted simply to serve a single purpose, i. c., to supply the needs of the people.

This complex problem is a duty of gigantic proportions; a duty which in its performance furnishes occupation for the human race and thereby provides the happiness of life. The lawmaking power has no function except to make the performance of this duty possible. Its function is wisely exercised when the duty is rendered of easy performance.

If this was an ideal age, in which every one of those duty performers was capable and honest, the burdens would be easily borne, but unfortunately there are in the world those who are not capable, those who are not honest, and therefore the burdens are shifted, and those who are not honest, and therefore the burdens are shifted, and those who are not capable in a selfish struggle, but should have their rights so firmly defined and their responsibilities so clearly fixed that the incapable would be strengthened and the dishonest would be curbed, to the end that when the unavoidable shifting of burdens came because of incapacity or dishonesty they should be transferred to the shoulders which should bear them. Unfortunately the conditions are such under the present laws that the vills of incapacity and dishonesty are not infrequently visited upon the innocent and not upon the guitty or those who are not farguently visited upon the innocent and not upon the guitty or those who are not fault.

That the colonial patriots foresaw t

Now, Mr. Speaker, the National Board of Trade is not a local institution and does not represent merely any one section of the country. I will read the names of the commercial bodies that go to make it up, in order to show that it is really national in its character:

Constituent bodies of the National Board of Trade are the Albany Chamber of Commerce; Ashland (Wis.) Business Men's Association; Boston Merchants' Association; Boston Paper Trade Association; Bradford (Pa.) Board of Trade; Bridgeport Board of Trade; Brunswick (Ga.) Now, believing as I do in national bankruptcy legislation, I feel confident, for the reasons I have stated, that we can safely adopt this bill; and if after all the care that has been exercised defects are found in practice, they can be remedied after discovery. Mr. Speaker, we are in the midst of a condition of affairs where bankruptcy unfortunately is common, and I fear that it is likely in the near future to become much more so. Under these circumstances some provision of national law is necessary by which an insolvent debtor can surrender his property and receive a discharge which shall be good in any State in the Union, and by which his creditors can each receive their fair proportion of the insolvent's estate.

I have listened with great interest to several of the eloquent speakers on the other side of this question, and outside of the legal points raised, which, as I said before, I will leave to my legal colleagues on this side of the question, it seems to me that the pith of the contention on the other side is that this bill is in some way opposed to the interest of the poor man. Now, gentlemen, the poor man never lacks advocates if he does lack friends, and there have been in every legislative body enough of both to warrant the opinion that poverty ought to have been and would have been abolished long ago if the knowledge and judgment of those who spoke for him had been equal to their eloquence and kindly feeling. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I wish to do all I can for the poor man myself, in fairness to the rest of the community, and I am willing to resolve all questions of doubt in his favor; but alas, time has shown that many measures intended to help him have really resulted in detriment to his interests or else have done him no good at all.

It seems to me that careful and unprejudiced study of the best way to help him will be much more beneficial than unlimited declamation without it. But how is this bill to injure the poor man? In the section which I come from, New England, the wageearner is generally appealed to as the poor man par excellence. Now, that title does not apply to a large proportion of the wage-earners, but the wage-earners are exempt from the provisions of this proposed bankrupt act. In the South and West the farmer is generally spoken of as the poor man. I am glad to believe that he is far from it in many cases at least, but even if not this law does not apply to him either. It is especially designed, as I understand it, for manufacturers and merchants. Now, the class of manufacturers is alleged and believed by many to be so pampered by a protective tariff as to be very far removed from any danger of bankruptcy [laughter], and as to traders, they are not generally included in the enumeration of the poor. But beyond that, gentlemen, there are poor men among creditors as well as among debtors. I doubt if there is one single member on this floor who does not know personally of cases where insolvent debtors are living in comfort and luxury and paying none of their past debts, while many of their cred itors are in want. I know of a case myself where an insolvent debtor was driven to a meeting of his creditors in his own carriage, while his creditors, some of them at least, were obliged to go on foot. But, admitting that the great mass of debtors that this bill is to provide for are poor as well as insolvent, is not a law which enables the poor insolvent debtor to give up his property and receive a discharge for all past debts, a good thing for him rather than a hardship or an oppression? And, if a settlement is to be made, Mr. Speaker, how can it injure the debtor if a fair rather than an unfair division of his property is to be made among his creditors? This I understand to be the object that this bill is intended to accomplish, and in that view and on that ground I desire to be counted in favor of it. [Applause.]

[Mr. CULBERSON addressed the committee. See Appen-

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the able speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. interest to the able speech of the gentleman from Texas [Afr. CULBERSON] who has just taken his seat. I regret exceedingly, however, that he should have marred so able a speech by an appeal, at its close, to partisan prejudice. The question that is before us is purely a business question. There is not in it appropriately a single element of partisanship, or any principle which divides men on party lines.

I had not intended until this afternoon to say anything upon this question, preferring to leave the discussion to the able gentlemen, members of the bar, members of the Judiciary Committee, and others who have had practical experience in administering bankruptcy laws.

While I agree with some of the criticisms of the details of the bill before us, which have been made by my friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], I must take this opportunity to dissent from so much of his speech as is directed against any bankruptcy

I do not agree with all that is in the bill before us. I propose at a later stage of these proceedings when the bill is considered in committee for amendment, to indicate some of the features to which I object, and to endeavor to have a modification of them.

In view of my judgment of the wisdom and even the necessity of some bankruptcy legislation, I propose to vote for this measure in the shape in which it shall be when it shall emerge from the Committee of the Whole, in the hope, I may say in the expectation, that when it shall also have been fully considered by the Senate, and shall have been adjusted in conference, we shall have a measure which I can heartly support and which I believe will be in the interest of the whole country.

I do not propose, therefore, at this time to discuss the details of this measure, but simply to briefly indicate some reasons why it seems to me this Congress should take affirmative action with respect to bankruptcy legislation.

And first, Mr. Chairman, it must be agreed that the framework of our Government contemplates national bankruptcy legislation. The framers of our Government, in constructing that great instrument, the Constitution of the United States, in drawing the line of demarcation between the States, in drawing the line of demarcation between the State and national power, intrusted bankruptcy legislation to the Congress of the United States, and withheld it from the Legislatures of the several States of the Union.

If there is to be bankruptcy legislation at all, therefore, comprehensive legislation, covering the ground which the framers of our Constitution intended should be covered, it must be national. It can not be simply State.

And, Mr. Chairman, I hold that the framers of our Government, in intrusting the power to enact bankruptcy laws to the national rather than to the State authority, acted wisely, with a keen comprehension that such legislation is a necessary incident of domestic commerce, and that we shall be false to the highest interests of the country if we allow prejudice or distrust of the national authority to lead us to refuse to enact such laws.

I know that we have had bankruptcy legislation for only comparatively short periods in the existence of this nation—three laws in all; the last of which remained only eleven years upon the statute books of the nation. I think, however, that we can discover in the early condition of the country and in some of the features of this legislation an explanation for the comparatively short lease of such legislation.

In the early history of this country, before interstate com-merce had been developed to the extent that it has within recent ears, before the construction of railroads and telegraphs and the growth of the intimate business relations now existing be-tween every part of this country, which makes Texas commer-cially as near to New York and New York as near to San Francisco as Philadelphia was to Pittsburg seventy-five years ago, we can see in the development of the means of communication a reason, a necessity, for national bankruptey legislation that did not exist fifty or seventy-five years ago. We have become a great nation commercially as well as politically. Every part of this country is commercially linked with every other part. The merchant in New England is dealing every day with the merchant in New Orleans and Galveston. The merchant of Boston every day. State lines have been broken down commercially in the day. State lines have been broken down commercially in the progress of this nation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in consequence of the improvement of the means of communication in this country, and the immense development of interstate trade, it has become necessary that Congress should use the power which the framers of this Government placed in the Constitution, and enact laws which shall be national in their character as relating to bankruptcy and insolvency. We can not defer action in this direction without serious evils arising. Indeed such evils are already here.

There have been elements in the bankruptcy legislation here tofore enacted which have almost inevitably aroused opposition. I need not stop to recall them, because you gentlemen are aware of them. One of those elements was the unnecessary expense attending the administration of our bankruptcy laws in the past.
To a great extent this bill has overcome the difficulties which have been so fruitful of criticism in the past. It seems to me there may be amendments adopted which will serve still more to overcome those difficulties. It can not be possible, after all our experience in administering such laws, with all parts of this country commercially interlinked as never before, with the necessity upon us for some legislation in this direction, that the wit of man can not conceive uniform bankruptcy legislation extending from Maine to Texas, from New York to Oregon, which shall work with facility, with efficiency, with justice, and with reasonable satisfaction; secure justice; conserve the interests of both debtor and creditor, and promote the best interests of the both debtor and creditor, and promote the best interests of the vast business of a great people.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman will pardon an interruption, I would suggest that if you could devise a system which would discharge the bankrupt and at the same time leave him in possession of his property, it would probably be satisfactory to some of the opponents of the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. It would appear that much of the opposition to the bankruptcy bill is based on such a desire.

Mr. BOATNER. I doubt whether any other system of bankruptcy would be satisfactory.

mr. BOATNER. I doubt whether any other system of bankruptcy would be satisfactory.
Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, there is a second renson for national bankruptcy legislation. Justice to the debtor—humanity at least, requires it. Under our laws as they exist to-day, and as they must exist under the Constitution which withholds from the State the power of releasing obligations to nonresident creditors, it is not possible for any insolvent debtor, however op-pressed may be his condition, to lift from himself any liability to creditors outside of the State in which he resides by anything else than absolute and complete payment. He may surrender all his property, but the liability to pay the balance still hangs over

Gentlemen know honest neighbors in their several localities, just as I know neighbors in the State where I reside who to-day, being insolvent through their misfortunes, are unable to engage in active business because of debts hanging over them which they have contracted to creditors in other States. If we could know correctly how much the country is losing through the forced in ctivity of a large body of insolvents, honest men who desire to be freed from the debt burdens which oppress them, and to enter upon the work of production and distribu-tion again in this country, and yet can not lift their hands in their own name to enter upon active business, it would aston-

Now, it is inhumane, it seems to me, in the legislation of any country to leave honest but unfortunate debtors in this plight, this inability to habilitate themselves and enter once more upon their work as honest and efficient citizens No other country does leave any of its debtors in such position through the failure to legislate.

And yet, because gentlemen pretend to be fearful that any national legislation may be used to make the condition of debtors worse, they refuse to take a single step toward lightening the burden of men known to all of us, who are thus unable to enter again upon the active work of life. Our country is losing every year through these men thus forced to be inactive more than an possibly be imagined.

I have heard during the past few days lurid denunciations of a national banking law, alleged to be an engine for the oppression of debtors; and when I have heard them I have carefully listened for an intelligent explanation of such results, and I have not as yet heard any.

Now, instead of placing new burdens on the honest debtor, I assert—and I ask for proof to the contrary—that it will improve his condition. Of course it is admitted that it will improve the condition of the hopelessly insolvent debtor by relieving him from the entire burden of his indebtedness on the surrender of his property.

is property. So much is clear gain.

Again, take the case of the debtor who is not able to pay his aper at maturity, but who yet expects in due time to meet all is obligations. What is his situation now? His property is paper at maturity, but who yet expects in due time to meet all his obligations. What is his situation now? His property is subject to attachment under State laws. Each of his creditors, especially those out of the State, fears that other creditors, especially those in the State, will endeavor to get ahead and attach the creditor's property, for "first come, first served."

The chances are more than even that in this state of uncertainty one creditor will secure his debt by attachment, or a preferential conveyance, and then all the others will follow like a pack of wolves, trying each to get in ahead, and the infortunate creditor will be made hopelessly insolvent. If a national bank-ruptcy law existed, so that neither creditor could get an advantage of the other, and that in case the debtor should fall each would come in for his share, all would allow the debtor to go on, and even give him a helping hand.

In short, under any and all circumstances, the national bankruptcy law would improve the situation of the honest debtor, and have thousands from bankruptcy who would be carried down by State attachment laws, or by the inability of State insolvent or Thirdly. Justice to the creditor, particularly the creditor who resides in States other than that in which the debtor lives, requires national bankruptcy legislation. As it is now, legislation in some States practically discriminates in favor of creditors within their own borders, or at least allows a debtor to prefer creditors in such a way as to deprive the outside creditor of a just share of the insolvent's estate. Indeed, even if laws allowing the preferment of credits do not exist, the fact of nonresidence makes it probable that they will come in last in a race of attachments on the estate of a failed debtor. Everyoutside creditor wants only to share equally with other creditors in cases where debtors become insolvent. Why should he not?

But it is in cases where there are fraudulent acts on the part of the debtor that the outside creditor suffers most. For in such

But it is in cases where there are fraudulent acts on the part of the debtor that the outside creditor suffers most. For in such cases the chances are that inside creditors are mixed up with the fraudulent transactions of the debtors—transactions which can rarely ever be reached except by a court of bankruptcy. It is for these reasons that a national bankruptcy act not only

It is for these reasons that a national bankruptcy act not only protects and sustains the honest debtor, but also at the same time secures the just rights, and only the just rights, of the creditor to a proportionate share in the property of the insolvent debtor.

Much has been said in the progress of this debate in derogation of the creditors of this country. We might get the idea from the frequent reference to what has been styled the creditor class, that there is a distinct body of men in this country who are perpetual and irrevocable debtors, and another distinct class who are perpetual and irrevocable creditors. Now, there is no such state of things in this country.

The creditor of to-day is also the debtor of to-day in almost every instance, and the debtor of to-day is likely to be the creditor of to-morrow, and vice versa. There is no fixed class of debtors and creditors in a country like this. There is no class of men who, on the same day or within the same series of months, are simply debtors and not creditors.

We have beared a great deal said about the seconded room men

We have heard a great deal said about the so-called poor men of this country, the workingmen who are held up as debtors, and to whom this bill is said to be inimical. Why, Mr. Chairman, are you not aware that the largest body of creditors in this country are the workingmen? They have to-day over $1,700,000,000 deposited in the savings banks of this country, placed there to their credit, and loaned to the debtors of this country; and it is through the lo unsout of the savings of these workingmen, whom you are pretending to care for as debtors who want to avoid payment of their debts, that the business of this country is being largely carried on to-day. My experience as a business man is that the largest debtors are men of means, the men who are engaged in large business operations, and who are obliged to engaged in large business operations, and who are obliged to constantly hire money to do their business.

I have had some opportunity to observe to whom loans were being extended by banking institutions, and I want to say to you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, what many of you know, that the debtors of this country are not to a great extent the poor men, but they are the men of means.

I repeat, there is no distinct class of debtors in this country.

I repeat, there is no distinct class of debtors in this country. All are at the same time or at different times both creditors and debtors. What is for the interest of the creditor is for the interest of the debtor also, and justice to each secures the highest welfare of each. I am tired of sitting in this House and hearing from day to day gentlemen claim to be the special friends of the poor man and of the workingman, and, under the guise of championing their interest, declaiming against legislation that is for their interest as much as it is for the interest of any other people

In this country.

Let us have done with this class talk. Whatever legislation commends itself as in the interest of all should be supported because it is wise, not declaimed against on the assumption, false in most cases, that it is for the interest of the "money power" and against the interest of the poor man. When the laws of the State do equal justice to both creditor and debtor, they subserve the interests of both in the highest degree.

an most cases, that it is for the interest of the "money power" and against the interest of the poor man. When the laws of the State do equal justice to both creditor and debtor, they subserve the interests of both in the highest degree.

Is it necessarily a misfortune to be a debtor? Is it a crime to be a creditor? Why, sir, a large portion of the existing debts in this country mean simply that those who have contracted them are the active, carnest, pushing men in every community, and it is because they are able to make such loans that they are doing the best for themselves and for the communities in which they live.

This leads me to speak of a fourth reason why I am in favor of national bankruptcy legislation. That reason is that it tends to strengthen the great credit system of this country. Ninety per cent of the business of this country is conducted on credit. In every community there are pushing young men and men of middle age who, having little capital of their own, are obtaining loans and are thus enabled to enter upon active business and bring prosperity to themselves, to their employés, and to the communities in which they reside. Do you want to break down or weaken the credit system or do you prefer to strengthen it I should judge from what has been said by many gentlemen in the course of this debate that they would consider it a misfortune to have the credit of the people of their State or communities strengthened?

Why, sir, I have heard not only now, but in the past, complaints from the southern portion of this Union, that they have not capital aufficient to develop their resources, and that because of this lack of capital their prosperity is hampered. That part of our country is among the fairest on God's earth, filled with resources awaiting development; and you are inviting capital and energy to come in and develop it. But capital and energy will not go there unless there is confidence in your States, confidence in your justice and laws, confidence that when loans are extended to you they will be repaid. And gentlemen who legislate or fail to legislate in any direction that serves to weaken this confidence are doing their own States an injury that can not be overestimated.

Gentlemen who think that in their own States they can enact laws that make it difficult to collect debts, or who enact or withhold legislation which will enable the debtors in a State to make their own citizens preferred creditors, as against outside creditors, and who think they are gaining through such a process are making a great mistake. For rest assured that whatever weakens your credit increases the cost of what you have to buy and raises the rate of interest on your loans.

The one thing that the South needs to-day is the confidence of the men who have capital—the very men whom some of you stigmatize as the "money power," the gold bugs"—and any legislation which tends in that direction, which gives the creditor in one State confidence that the debtor in the other State will treat him just as well as he will treat the creditor in the State in which he resides, any legislation which will tend to secure such confidence, as a national bankruptcy law does, will give that portion of our country what it wants, more capital to develop its great resources and greater prosperity.

Mr. Chairman, for these and other reasons I am earnestly in favor of wise and well-adjusted national bankruptcy legislation. It is enjoined by the Constitution. It is necessary to conserve the best interests of debtors. It is essential to do justice to creditors. It is called for to strengthen credit and promote business and industrial prosperity. And it will contribute to further cement the Union formed to advance the commercial as well as political interests of this great nation. [Applause.]

Mr. OATES. I move that the committee now rise.
The motion was agreed to.
The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and had some to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, or that we take a recess now until that hour The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] asks unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until

SENATE.

TUESDAY, October 31, 1893.

'rayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal of the proceedings of the last legislative day will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day Tuesday, October 17, 1893.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the Journal covers many days, I think it would be hardly worth while to read it. Most of it is merely formal matter. I move, therefore, to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Journal will stand approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communica-tion from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a state-ment from the Acting Director of the Mint in relation to an appropriation of $15,000 for freight on bullion and coin between mints and assay offices for the current fiscal year; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a petition of Typographical Union, No. 72, of Lansing, Mich., praying for the immediate construction, by day labor, of a building for the Government Printing Office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Kansas City, Mo., praying for such modification of the duties on imports from Mexico as will encourage trade between that counand the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Committee on Printing.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 1138) to repeal so much of a proviso of an act entitled "An act making appropriations of a provise of an act entitled. An act making appropriations for invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1893, as relates to the payment of pensions to nonresidents who are not citizens of the United States; which was read twice by its title.

COURTS IN SOUTH DAKOTA,

Mr. PUGH, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2799) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and and place of North Baketa, to report it with amendments. The Senators from South Dakota are very anxious for the passage of the bill, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was in section 2, line 7, after the word "Todd," to insert, "Beadle, Kingsbury, Crow Creek, and Lower Brule;" and in line 11, to strike out the words "Beadle, Kingsbury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 13, to insert "McPherson, Edmunds, Campbell, Walworth;" in line 16, to strike out "McPherson, Edmunds;" and in line 17 to strike out "Campbell, Walworth."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 2, line 20, after the words "Standing Rock," to insert "and;" and in line 21, to strike out the words "Lower Brule, and Crow Creek."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of section 6:

And all grand and petit juries for the circuit and district courts shall be drawn by the clerk of the circuit court, and all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be residents of such division.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS UNDER DESERT-LAND ACT.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (S. 592) to extend the time for making final payments on entries under the desert-land act, and to ask for its immediate consideration. It is a very short bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was, to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the time of making final payments on entries under the desert-land act is hereby extended for one year from the date when the same become due in all cases where desert-land entrymen are unable to make final payments from causes which they can not control, evidence of such inability to be subject to the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to interfere with anything which the Senator from Mississippi thinks desirable, unless some question of principle is at stake; but it seems to me that this is important legislation and should come in the ordinary way, unless there be some good reason for haste.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will state the reason why immediate action is desired. The bill is intended to afford some slight relief to the desert-land entrymen. Most of the desert land entries are located in what are called the mining States. The people of those States, for reasons which have been pretty fully discussed here of late, are in a condition of considerable financial distress. The bill as originally introduced proposed to extend the time to make final payment on entries under the desert-land act for three The amendment of the committee proposes to extend the time not for three years, but for one year, and to limit the benefits of the extension to persons who deserve it and ought to have it. It is very apparent that the bill ought to pass at once if it

Mr. POWER. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not object to the consideration of the bill. I introduced the bill at the request of settlers of Montana and other mining States, and it is important that the time should be extended one year.

reported favorably by the committee on the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. WALTHALL. I will state further for the information of the Senator from Massachusetts that a bill even more liberal than this has passed the Senate and passed the other House at the present session for the benfit of homestead settlers in Okla-

Mr. HOAR. I interposed the objection without knowing what bill was before the Senate, and of course without knowing what were its particular provisions. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that it is not a wise method of legislation to pass important general bills in this way, out of order and in the morning hour. But on the statement which has been made by the Senator from Mississippi, and especially by the Senator from Montana who introduced the bill, I shall not press objection to this measure

Mr. WALTHALL. I wish to state further, for the benefit of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the bill is unanimously re-ported by the Committee on Public Lands. It has met the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. There eems to be no possible objection that can be urged to it. Otherwise I should not have asked that it be taken up at this time

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1139) to amend an act of Congress approved May 19, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Harbor Company the right to improve Aransas Pass; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (S. 1140) for the relief of William Bushby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1141) for the relief of S. J. Block and A. P. Baurman, of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. POWER introduced a bill (S. 1142) directing the parting and refining of bullion to be carried on at the United States assay office at Helena, Mont.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (8. 1143) for the speedy determination of constitute to the committee of the speedy determination of constitute to the committee of the speedy determination of constitute to the speedy determination of constitu nation of questions touching the jurisdiction of circuit courts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. BLACKBURN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved. That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate what revision of or amendments to the rules, if any, should be adopted to secure a more efficient and satisfactory disposition of the business of the Senate.

Mr. GORMAN subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent that the various amendments proposed to the rules which are lying on the table be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair).

The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that pending amendments to the rules of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland? The Chair hears none, and it is so or

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Arkansas, it was Ordered, That the hour of the daily meeting of the Senate be 12 o'clock meridian, until otherwise ordered.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask leave to introduce a resolution to continue the powers and duties of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry as defined by resolutions heretofore passed by the Senate. Owing to the extra session the duties which were imposed by the Senate upon that committee could not be performed, and it is the purpose of the committee to go on now and perform the duties. The money for this purpose has already been provided and set apart by the Senate upon the report of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. It is necessary new to research the resolution continuing the powers. essary now to pass another resolution continuing the powers and duties of the committee during the recess and the next session of Congress. I therefore introduce and ask for the present consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the powers conferred and duties imposed on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and all the provisions of the resolutions of April 19, 1892, and March 3, 1893, be continued during the recess after the expiration of the present session and during the next session of the Senate.

I ask for the consideration of the resolution at this time. Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. I ask the Senator from Mississippi if the resolution does not provide for the expenditure of money from the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. GEORGE. The matter has already been referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses and the sum necessary for the investigation allotted by the Senate on the report of the committee.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. I understand, then, that the purpose of the resolution is simply to cover the allotment of funds already made. Mr. GEORGE. It is an allotment already made, and the money remains unexpended because the committee were unable, owing to the present extra session of Congress, to perform the duties imposed on them.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi if he can inform this side of the Chamber what he understands, so far as the purposes of the majority are concerned, by the recess of the Senate of which the resolution speaks. I suppose there are a good many of us who would like to make arrange-ments for a recess, if one is to be taken. In my own State there ments for a recess, of olde is to be taken. In My Will State the is an important political campaign going on which I should like to take part in if I can do so without sacrificing other public obligations. What recess does the Senator anticipate?

Mr. GEORGE. I was informed by the financial clerk of the Senate that if there is a recess of the Senate, the powers and duration will exprise.

ties of the committee will expire. It was to cover a contingency of that kind that I have offered the resolution. It is to be done should a recess occur, but I do not know whether a recess will bet ken. The object of the resolution is to continue the powers of the committee during the recess, if one should occur, and during the next session of the Senate. I know nothing about any arrangement concerning a recess.

Mr. HOAR. I of course have no desire to pry unduly into any parliamentary secrets, and I do not know that there are any anywhere to be pried into.

Mr. GEORGE. There are none so far as I am concerned. I

Mr. HOAR. But it would be very gratifying to a great many Senators on this side of the Chamber if, when the majority have determined what the condition and exigencies of the public business require, they would at the earliest moment make the information public, so that we could make our arrangements for the future. Whether there is to be a continuous session until the 1st of December or whether the Senate will probably adjourn as soon as the important bill passed yesterday has been dealt with elsewhere we should be very glad, indeed, if we could be informed. Probably the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] can inform

Mr. GEORGE. I am unable to give any information on that subject. Mr. BATE. As a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I desire to say that the appropriation was made, the committee had their arrangements all made to go and make the investigation required of the committee, but were unable to do so simply because of the call for an extra session. Our arrangements were made to consummate the intention of the resolution in the month of August, but we were unable to do it, and now, perhaps, the opportunity will occur, and hence the resolution of the Senator from Mississippi should be passed.

Mr. GORMAN. I do not desire to interfere with the passage of the resolution. Mr. GEORGE. I ask that the resolution be passed.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask leave of the Senate that the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry charged with the duty of investigating the question concerning cotton have leave of the Senate to sit during the sessions of the Senate and at the next session as well as the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. PEFFER. What is the request?
The VICE-PRESIDENT. That the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry charged with an inquiry into the decline in the price of cotton have leave to sit during the essions of the Senate at the present and also at the next session of Congress. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts asked me a question a moment ago, or rather referred to me in the matter of an adjournment. I wish to say to him frankly that, so far as I know, there has been no conference amongst Senators in the majority in regard to an adjournment, but I understand that the bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892, which has come over from the House of Representatives, should be disposed of. There are interests involved which has the property of may be very injuriously affected if the bill is not disposed of at the present session. Beyond that my belief is, and it is only the expression of an opinion, so far as I can gather, with the business for which we were called together dealt with and that measure disposed of, in all probability we shall adjourn or take a recess.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 36) transferring the exhibit of the Navy Department, known as the model battle ship Illinois, to the State of Illinois, as a naval armory for the use of the naval militia of the State of Illinois, on the termination of the World's Columbian Exposition.

DEPARTMENTAL SUPPLIES AT WASHINGTON.

The Vice-President laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 4292) to amend section 3709 of the Revised Statutes relating to contracts for supplies in the Departments at Washington; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill was reported to the House of Representatives from the Joint Commission to Inquire into the Status of the Laws Organizing the Executive Departments, etc. and has been passed by the House. I desire now on the part of the Senate members of the Joint Commission to report favorably in behalf of the same bill. I submit the report, and ask that only the bill as passed by the House may be printed, that the Senate report be considered an indorsement and recommendation of the passage of that bill, and that the bill from the House of Representatives may be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection that order will be made.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 1956) to require judges of the courts of the United States to conform to the laws of the several States in delivering charges to juries;

A bill (H. R. 3981) to amend section 5391 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the punishment of certain minor offenses in reservations or places over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction; and

A bill (H. R. 4186) to regulate the fees of the clerk of the United States court for the Indian Territory.

The bill (H. R. 4243) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements over and on the West Mountain of the Hot Springs Reservation, Hot Springs, Ark., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BRIDGE.

Mr. HILL. If the morning business is concluded, I move that the Senate take up for consideration order of business No. 76, being the bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey.

Mr. McPHERSON. I rise for the purpose of objecting to the motion made by the Senator from New York, as necessarily, if this bill shall come up now in the morning hour, under Rule VIII but five minutes will be allowed for debate by each Senator. I wish to ask the Senator, wihout being considered factious at all with respect to a vote upon this bill, that it may lie over until to-morrow, if no longer time be allowed. tor knows that we have been very busy here with other matters for some time past. I have given no attention to the report made by the committee. I notice, however, that the bill as re-ported is unlike the bills which have heretofore been reported on the same subject.

The people of my State are very much interested in having this question properly presented to the Senate, and I have been unable, as I have said to the Senator, to give the subject the attention which I desire to do before its consideration. I should prefer that the Senator would allow the bill to go over until the December session, but if he objects to that I hope he will consent to its going over at least until to sent to its going over at least until to-morrow morning, so that I may have a sufficient amount of time to lay my views in regard to the bill before the Senate. I think also that the people of a good many other States besides those of New York and New Jersey feel interested in this matter.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, in regard to the first point made by the Senator from New Jersey I have only to say that it is not well taken. I shall move the consideration of the bill, and if the Senate shall see fit by a vote to take it up, debate upon it will not be limited to five minutes, but it will be subject to unlimited debate, an expression with which we have become somewhat familiar in the Senate. The five-minute rule will not apply where the Senate by a vote sees fit to take up a bill. Therefore there is nothing in that point. If the bill is taken up, the Senate proceeds with its consideration the same as upon any other bill taken up by vote.

I should be very glad to oblige the Senator from New Jersey, but, nevertheless, I am led to the opinion that the Senator is entirely familiar with this question, and has kept track of the progress of this bill in the committee and electrons. ress of this bill in the committee and elsewhere. It can not have escaped his attention that the bill passed the House of Representatives almost unanimously, there being, I think, but one vote against it.

I desire to state for the information of the Senate that the bill has been before the Senate Committee on Commerce, and re-ceived their most patient and careful consideration, and the unanimous report of that committee. I can not imagine what objection there can be to the bill. It is not a complicated bill, and there are no complicated questions arising out of it.

The motion to take up the bill, I am aware, is not debatable, and I shall not impose further on the Senate. I hope the motion will carry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York to take up the bill indicated by him. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3280) to author-ize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to con-atruct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in the second clause, line 16, after the word "may," to strike out "lay upon or," and insert "locate, construct, and maintain;" in line 17, after the word "bridge," to insert "and the approaches thereto;" and in line 18, after the word "railroads," to strike out "and locate, construct, and maintain such connections as are necessary and proper with railroads at the ends of said bridge, or approaches thereto:" so as to read:

Second. That the companies may locate, construct and maintain over such bridge and the approaches thereto railroad tracks for the use of railroads.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 22, after the the word "connect," to strike out "their" and insert "its;" in line 23, before the words "itsapproaches," to strike out "tracks" and insert "and; "in the same line, after the word "approaches," to strike out "and connections;" in line 24, before the words "rolling stock," to strike out "their" and insert "its," and in line 27, after the words "decided by the," to strike out "Interstate Commerce Commissioners of the United States under set. state Commerce Commissioners of the United States, under such rules and regulations as they may prescribe "and insert "Secretary of War;" so as to read:

Provided, That any railroad on either side of said river shall be permitted to connect its tracks with said bridge and its approaches, and shall have equal rights of transit for its rolling stock, cars, passengers, and freight upon equal and equitable terms, and if a dispute as to the equality or equity of the terms shall arise, it shall be submitted to and decided by the Secretary of War. tary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same clause, line 32, after the words "city of New York," to strike out:

Words "City of New York," to strike out:

And provided further, That no railroad or railroads shall be operated on the approaches of said bridge companies in the city of New York except on such approaches as have been located in said city with the approval of the commissioners of the sinking fund of said city of New York: And provided further. That nothing in this act shall authorize the laying down of any railroad tracks upon the approaches in the city of New York except such as may be approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of New York.

The amendment was agreed to.
The next amendment was, in clause 8, line 97, after the word "reserved," to strike out:

And nothing herein shall be construed as a repeal or interference with any right to build a bridge across the Hudson River heretofore granted by Congress to any company, or bind this or any other Congress not to extend or renew the same;

And insert:

And the provisions of subdivision 3 of this act shall be extended to any other bridge company, heretofore authorized by Congress to bridge said river at New York City: Provided, That such company shall submit plans and location of its bridge, pursuant thereto, to the Secretary of War within one year after the passage of this act.

So as to make the clause read:

Eighth. The right to amend, alter, modify, or repeal this act is hereby reserved, and the provisions of subdivision 3 of this act shall be extended to any other bridge company, heretofore authorized by Congress to bridge said river at New York City: Provided, That such company shall submit plans, and location of its bridge, pursuant thereto, to the Secretary of War within one year after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have one or two amendments to offer to the bill, now that the committee amendments have been agreed to; although I suppose, the Committee amendments have been agreed to; although I suppose, the Committee on Commerce of this body having decided to surrender to the persistence of this bridge company, that it is hardly worth while for me to try to prevent the absolute destruction of that great harbor surrounding the city of New York. The determination seems to be to cripple it at least. I wish, in the first place, to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in on line 32 of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.
The SECRETARY. In clause second, line 42, after "New York," it is proposed to insert:
And in the State of New Jersey by the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Hudson.

Mr. VEST. Now let the text be read as it will stand if amended. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as re-

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided. That the location of all approaches of said bridge in the city of New York shall be approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of New York, and in the State of New Jersey by the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Hudson.

Mr. McPHERSON. The object of the amendment is simply this: Provision is made in the bill that the approaches to the bridge in the city of New York shall be approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of New York, and no provision whatever is made to have any supervisory power on the approaches to the bridge on the New Jersey side of the river. The bridge will necessarily pass through the township of Union, the city of Hoboken, and Jersey City. It may go upon the level of the streets or it will have under this bill the authority of Congress to take a roving commission and go where it pleases, of Congress to take a roving commission and go where it pleases, without any restriction whatever by the local authorities. That is a very unwise and improper neglect. The idea of passing through two great cities and through two townships on the Jersey side of the river without the company being restricted. by the approval of the municipal authorities is something which should not be permitted. This privilege is guarded as to the city of New York, but it is left unguarded as to the State of New

I propose to provide by my amendment that the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Hudson shall exercise this supervision, because they are the county board and represent what is known in many of the States as the board of supervisors. what is known in many of the States as the board of supervisors. The subject can hardly be left to the municipal authorities of two or three cities and the townships, and therefore by my amendment I propose to place the power in the hands of the county authorities, covering, as the authority granted by the bill will do, a large amount of territory, and running, as it will, 2 or 3 miles, according to their maps and plans, on the Jersey side.

I trust there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from New Jersey will perceive that by the report of the committee on this bill the provision which was contained in the bill as it came to the Senate apparently conferring upon the bridge corporation additional power to construct railroads has been stricken out, and also the provi-sion for the location of the connections. All that the term "approaches" means, I apprehend, as used in the bill are the ordinary approaches to the structure; and I suppose that the municipal authorities of Jersey City, or the other municipal authorities on the Jersey shore, would have ample power to make any regulations necessary in regard to the approaches to the proposed

I do not understand that Congress is conferring upon the bridge company the right to proceed to condemn or otherwise occupy private property; but they must proceed to get the right to construct their approaches the same as if nothing had been said in the bill about approaches. If the Senator from New Jersaid in the bill about approaches. If the Senator from New Jersey is not willing to leave the question of location to the city authorities, where I suppose the control of such improvements is left, we may, I suppose, substitute some other body; but I apprehend, as a rule, it would be better to leave such questions with the body which represents the municipality, and which can not only approve of a location but can provide the conditions upon which approaches may be erected.

There has been a controversy in the city of New York in regard to who should exercise the authority relative to the construction of the approaches to the bridge there, and especially struction of the approaches to the bridge there, and especially the question of connections, which was stricken out. I under-stand the city authorities have preferred, instead of leaving it to the city council, that it should be left to the board which is mentioned in the bill.

The term "approaches to the bridge" simply means that portion of the bridge which extends on to the land, which it is necessary to go upon in order to get the proper elevation over the water. If the Senator from New Jersey thinks there is anything to be gained by requiring some other board in the county to approve of that location I do not know that there will be any objection, but I do not think that approval would be final. think the bridge company would still be required to get the per mission of the city authorities as to the conditions upon which they may occupy the land.

Mr. McPHERSON. That may be necessary under some general law of New Jersey; but as the approaches necessarily are very long upon the Jersey side of the river, they strike an elevation upon that side and pass on down to the meadows below. where they connect with the different railroad systems, and they necessarily will have to pass through the town of Union, which has a municipal government, through West Hoboken, which has a municipal government; perhaps through some part of the city of Hoboken, which has a mayor and board of aldermen, and that portion of the territory of Jersey City, which would require the consent of four municipal governments. I prefer to leave the question with a power equally responsible, which is the board of chosen free-holders of the county of Hudson, which can represent the city of the county of Hudson, which can represent the city of the county sent the city authorities in county matters.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to suggest to the Senator that, according to my best judgment, by the adoption of his amendment we should only be putting upon the bridge company the necessity of securing an additional approval of the location. I do not believe that Congress has the power to take the matter out of the hands of the several municipal corporations, nor do I think the approval provided for by the Senator's amendment would prevent the necessity of cetting respirations from the several municipal. the necessity of getting permission from the several municipali-ties to the location, and having it prescribed by ordinance or by some other proper provision as to the conditions upon which the company might occupy streets.

Mr. McPHERSON. In the absence of any law, I do not understand how the company would be required to obtain the consent of the city authorities. I see that provision is made in the bill that, notwithstanding there is a municipal government in the city of New York, the approval does not rest with the mayor and the board of aldermen of that city, but a representative board is the board of aldermen of that city, but a representative board is named, a board appointed by the mayor of the city of New York, to wit, the board of sinking-fund commissioners.

Mr. DOLPH. Does the bill provide that that matter shall not be left to the city authorities?

Mr. McPHERSON. The bill provides that the location of the approaches in the city of New York shall be approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund; and therefore I suppose, under the wording of this bill, as I presume it will be pissed, that is all the authority they need. If the Congress of the United States provides not only for the building of the bridge, but the approaches, it should also designate the particular board which shall approve the location so far as the city is concerned. I can see no reason why the amendment I have offered should not be agreed to. It leaves the question to a proper and appropriate board, one entirely competent to deal with the subject, and a board which will have the entire confidence not only of the people of the city but of the surrounding country in the State of New Jersey.

Mr. DOLPH. That only goes to the question of location. The

Mr. DOLPH. That only goes to the question of location. The Senator does not propose that this company may go on and at its option determine the character or extent of the approaches, or what the elevation shall be, or the kind of structure which shall be had, and how it shall interfere with private property.

Mr. McPHERSON. The location of the approaches in the city of New York shall be approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund. My amendment states that the location and approaches of the bridge from the State of New Jersey shall be approved by the board of chosen freeholders of the county of Hudson.

Mr. HILL. I see no necessity or propriety in this amendment. If I understand the situation correctly, the approaches of the proposed bridge do not enter Jersey City at all. They are on the west side of Jersey City entirely, I understand.

Mr. McPHERSON. No; it runs for 3 miles through Jersey City as the man indicates.

City, as the map indicates.

Mr. HILL. Not the bridge proper or the approaches proper.

Mr. HILL. Not the bridge roper or the approaches proper. Mr. McPHERSON (indicating on plan). Here is the point where it crosses the river. It runs down here in a straight line and passes through Jersey City on the west side of the hill near the Hackensack River.

Mr. HILL. But all the provision for connections with the bridge have been stricken out. The committee saw fit not to make any provision in reference to connections. That will have to be done by the local legislatures of the two States, and necessivily by the local authorities.

The bridge company is incorporated by virtue of the charter

The bridge company is incorporated by virtue of the charter of the Legislature of the State of New York and also by virtue of an act of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey. The Legislature of the State of New Jersey gave its consent for the construction of this bridge in the following language:

That the said company shall have the power to erect, construct, and maintain a permanent bridge over the Hudson River, and construct and operate a railroad over the same between some suitable point in the city of New York and a point north of the southerly line of the township of Union, in the county of Hudson, in this State, and to lease, purchase, sequire, and hold as much real estate as may be necessary.

The Legislature of New Jersey, presumably as careful of the rights of the people of that locality as the Senator from New Jersey can possibly be, did not think it necessary to restrict this bridge company as to the particular spot beyond the designation

I hold in my hand a copy of the charter of the North River Bridge Company, which I understand the Senator from New Jersey championed in the Senate; and in that very bill, pussed here several years ago, there is no limitation whatever as to the particular point between certain points where the bridge company may locate the bridge. Certain points are designated, but beyond that the particular location or the particular roads are not specified. That was a bill the Senator himself championed in this body, I am informed, and I think he will acknowledge the fact. I can see no reason why this bill should be more specific than was the bill for what is called the North River Bridge

Mr. President, there was no real necessity for the incorpora-tion of this provision about the city of New York, which I will

Provided, That the location of all approaches of said bridge in the city of New York shall be approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of New York.

The city authorities insisted upon having some such provision, and rather than antagonize the local authorities of the city it was deemed best by the friends having the bill in charge and by the committee to allow the provision to be made. I do not think any member of the committee thought there was any necessity

Bear in mind, the construction of this bridge is to a certain extent limited and restricted by the bill. It cannot be below Sixty-sixth street in the city of New York; It must be above; and as to the particular point on the side of the city of New York, of course the authorities of the city are at liberty to designate where that I do not understand that the local authorities of Jersey shall be. City or the local authorities of the townships to which the Senator refers have asked for any such limitation or restriction. No petition has been presented here asking for this amendment, and no amendment has ever heretofore been suggested such as the Senator presents. I can see no propriety in the amendment, and I do not think there is any.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator from New York speaks of the North River Bridge Company, which he said I championed on the floor of the Senate. I do not know that I championed that bridge charter specially. I was in favor of it; I voted for it, as I am in favor of building bridges across the Hudson River provided they are built without placing any piers in the chan-provided they are built without placing any piers in the channel of the river and thereby obstructing navigation.

The New Jersey charter of which the Senator speaks was passed in 1868, at a time when in that part of the country through which this bridge and its approaches are now to be placed and located there was not a single building. It was a goat pasture. There was scarcely a street opened. No public attention was called to it. called to it.

Mr. HILL. On the Jersey side?
Mr. McPHERSON. Yes. To-day it is covered with immense blocks of buildings; streets are opened, and there is no reason in the world why this company may not locate it, in order to suit their special convenience, right through blocks of buildings, taking possession of streets and destroying boulevards and avenues which are now being built through that city. Therefore, in order that there may be no conflict of authority whatever, I claim that there should be some authority to supervise the bridge company to the extent that the approaches shall be laid in a manner least inconvenient and least troublessome and offensive and injuries. least inconvenient and least troublesome and offensive and injurious to the people. On the New York side the bill makes such For the New Jersey side you make no provision.

a provision. For the New Jersey side you make no provision. Now, the Senator says that these municipalities have not petitioned. I do not know that any petitions have been offered here respecting it, but I want to say another thing. The people of New Jersey have never believed that it was possible for the Senate of the United States to pass such a bridge bill as is now before this body, which proposes to locate upon the Jersey side of the river, 1,000 feet from the Jersey shore and near the center of that river, great large piers that will require for their foundation a territory almost equal to an island. That is exactly what you propose to do, and the people of New Jersey have left with the document of the propose to the theory was such a worst of intelligence and out the idea that there was such a want of intelligence and proper regard for commerce in the Congress of the United States as would ever permit it to be done.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair).

Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.

Mr. VEST. The question of intelligence is an open one, and the Senator subjects himself to some suspicion when he makes the statement he has done in regard to the committee. I want him to point out a provision in the bill that locates these piers

Mr. McPHERSON. Near the middle of the river—
Mr. VEST. I want him to point out the provision.
Mr. McPHERSON. I said near the middle of the river.
Mr. VEST. I want to see the provision that puts it near the middle of the river, or in the river at all.

Mr. McPHERSON. It does it, impliedly if not expressly.

As the Senator knows, the third section of the bill provides no pier shall be built on the New York side of said river outside of the existing pier-head line, and on the New Jersey side only at such a point as will make a clear water way of not less than 2,600 feet from the pier located on the New York side.

Now, we are told that the distance across the river at this point Now, we are told that the distance across the river at this point is about 3,100 feet. Then, 2,000 feet from the pier-head line on the New York side will leave a pier on the New Jersey side 1,100 feet from the pier-head line there. There is the authority that you grant in this bill to locate a pier on the New Jersey side of the river 1,100 feet in the channel from the Jersey shore, and from the pier-head line in the great harbor of New York, which is to-day doing a great share of the commerce of the whole of the United States of America.

Mr. VEST. The Senator, unintentionally doubtless, overlooks a provision on the third page of the bill, which is to the effect

a provision on the third page of the bill, which is to the effect that the construction of the bridge shall not be commenced until all the plans are approved by the Secretary of War. If the Secretary of Warcomes to the conclusion that putting a pier at any point in the river is an obstruction to navigation he at any point in the river is an observation to havigation he can prevent it. The only provision we make in regard to the piers is that the span shall be in any event not less than 2,000 feet, but if the Secretary of War requires a span of 3,000 feet he has the right to doit. I assert there is no such provision in the bill the right to doit. I assert there is no such provision in the bill as the Senator from New Jersey has stated.

Mr. McPHERSON. Well, I read from the bill.

Mr. VEST. Yes, but you leave out the discretionary clause which gives to the Secretary of War the right to approve or disapprove of any plans for the bridge.

Mr. McPHERSON. Ah, yes; but I am told then, in the very next breath, that application had been made at the War Department, and that a report had been received by the Board of Engineers indorsing and approving this bill. Now, I want to know, if they have been to the War Department and got a bill approved in advance by the Secretary of War and by the Board of Engineers, what kind of a power do you leave in the face of Engineers, what kind of a power do you leave in the face of such a report in the hands of the Secretary of War to undertake to move the pier out of the river?

Mr. VEST. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, I yield.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from New Jersey this morning indulging in a latitude of expression that is unusual for him and for the Senate. Permit me to say to him that he is entirely mistaken, to use no stronger term, in stating that the Secretary of War has approved the plan of this bridge. On the other hand, Gen. Casey, the Chief of Engineers, came before our committee and remained there during the whole time this bill was under discussion, and gave the committee to understand that he would consider carefully the plan and see that no ob-struction to navigation should be put in the river. I should like to know the authority upon which the Senator makes the statement that the Secretary of War in advance has approved of the pending bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will tell the Senator the authority upon which I make it. When I was handed a copy of the engineer's report I visited the Secretary of War and I asked him to explain how it was that I could be informed by outside parties that the War Department had approved a bill pending here which asked the power, and the other House had granted the power in the bill then before the committee of the Senate, which permitted a pier to be built within 1,100 feet of the Jersey shore and near the middle, certainly one-third of the distance across the river, the pier being large enough to obstruct the ice and obstruct commerce and everything else. He handed me a copy of the bill. I then asked the Secretary of War, "As an officer of this Government, with that bill before you, how much authority have you got to act in the premises?" "Well," he said, "I suppose I might require that the span should be larger."

Mr. VEST. Did he say that he had approved already the re-

Mr. McPHERSON. The report is signed by the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the board of engineers to Conwithout criticism.

Mr. VEST. I understood the Senator to say that the Secretary of War in advance had approved this plan.

Mr. McPHERSON. I said the board of engineers to whom he referred it, and the report was sent by the Secretary of War to Congress in reply to an inquiry.

Mr. VEST. Oh, the board of engineers. There is a report by the board of engineers which has not been adopted, and we therefore put specifically in the bill a provision that Gen. Casey, the Chief of Engineers, shall approve of the plan before any portion of the construction of the bridge shall be begun. Now, the Senator says the Secretary of War has approved of it in advance, and he goes on to state that the Secretary of War told him, on the other hand, that he would have a right to demand under the provision as he understood the proposed legislation, a longer provision, as he understood the proposed legislation, a longer span than that named in the bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then you are told again by the bridge company that inasmuch as they want to build an inexpensive bridge, they want to build a cantalever bridge, and they can not build it with more than 2,000 feetspan. It seems as though a kind of report had been received here from the Engineer Department, of report had been received here from the Engineer Department, contrary, I understand, to every recommendation heretofore made by Gen. Casey, the Chief of Engineers, that no pier should ever be allowed in that river. Now, then, the effect of it is this: It simply enables this company to build a cheap, economical bridge at the expense of the commerce of that great port. In my opinion, if the people of New York and New Jersey were consulted to-day upon this question they would prefer to pay one-half the entire expense of the construction of this bridge. and they could afford to do it, rather than have piers put in the

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me, I certainly hope that the bill is sufficiently protected by those provisions which require the Secretary of War to carefully consider what obstruction may be presented by the construction of the bridge to the commerce of the country; but I wish to call attention to one feature that presents to my mind a special danger in the construction. tion of all bridges over tidewater streams as distinguished from streams that are not tidewater. It is not the obstruction a pier presents to the commerce of the country by preventing or interfering or making troublesome the going to and fro of craft, but every pier large or small placed in the tideway of a stream presents a measurable obstruct to the flow of the tide up that stream.

Just so much less water flows up as is represented by the cubic contents of that pier or obstruction, and of course there is just so much less to come down. Now a tideway stream like the Hudson might by obstructions, by the building out of wharves on both sides, be brought to a mere filum aquæ, to a mere thread of water that would be perfectly useless for the purposes of navigation. In fact a tideway stream may be blocked off entirely by a dam, and the water will rise on the face of the damand will not flow up at all, thereby differing from such streams as the Mississippi where the current of the water collected from all its affluents and its watershed must flow down and make a channel

The water that flows down the Hudson and other tideway streams is the water that goes up, and you measurably prevent water from going up by every obstruction you place in the tideway. So I hope the bill will be guarded by an authority to the Secretary of War sufficient to compel his attention to the exercise of the power of the General Government to protect the navigability of the great streams of our country.

Mr. RANSOM. Will my friend from New Jersey yield to me? Mr. McPHERSON. Oh, yes. Mr. RANSOM. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator's remarks but it is right that I should say the Committee on Commerce in considering this bill felt called upon to invite Gen. Casey, the Chief of United States Engineers, before it. He was before us Chief of United States Engineers, before it. He was before us for a long time in consultation upon the bill and the provisions in the bill were drawn when he was present, with the distinct statement by him that its provisions would furnish every protection to commerce and to the people on the borders of the river that could be afforded. The bill was constructed with that view after full consultation with him.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then the Senator from North Carolina says that Gen. Casey has already assented to it in the presence of the committee. This is too much; it fairly staggers belief, considering Gen. Casey's record upon this subject.

of the committee. This is too much; it fairly staggers belief, considering Gen. Casey's record upon this subject.

Mr. RANSOM. Gen. Casey has approved of this proposition. He has said as an engineer, so far as an engineer could say so. that the bill would furnish all the protection to commerce that it could have, and that the final clause of the bill, stating that all of the bridge construction must be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War, is the very best proposition that could be put in to accomplish the object the Senator from New Jersey has in view. If my friend will pardon me one moment (I know how I am imposing on his patience), I will state that the bill provides that there must be a water way of not less than 2,000 feet, but the pier may be located as much further as the Secretary of War, under the advice of the engineers, shall determine to be nec

Mr. McPHERSON. The Maritime Association of the city of New York, that I suppose represents the great commercial interests of that port quite as accurately as does the Senator from New York, are here with a protest. The Maritime Association of the port of New York are supposed by the people of the city of New York, the port of New York, and the State of New York to look after any encroachment upon the commerce of that great port, and it is presumed that they are doing so. They are here with a protest against the passage of this proposed act.

I will state the reasons urged by the Maritime Association why this pier should not be put in the river; and I want to call the attention of the Senator from New York to a single fact connected with the legislation of his own State. In 1890 this company asked the Legislature of New York for the privilege of his control of the privilege of the of the priv building a bridge to connect with the Jersey bridge. The State Legislature of New York absolutely denied to them the right to put a pier in the river either upon the New York or the New Jersey side. They said it should be a single span across the entire river. I read the language of the act:

"The said bridge shall be constructed with a single span over the entire

But this company purchased an old charter in New Jersey passed in 1868. They then went to the Legislature of the State of New York, and the Legislature denied to the company the right to put a pier in the river anywhere, and denied to them the right even to lay a railroad track over their bridge. Now, they come to Congress, and ask the Senate of the United States to assist them in destroying this great waterway for no reason on earth except that it will save them a certain sum of money in the construction of the bridge.

The North River Bridge Company of which the Senator spoke has a charter passed by Congress three or four years ago. It proposes to span the entire river, 3,000 feet, with a suspension bridge. It has been ready to go on with its work, the money was in sight to build it, at least very largely, until an application came to Congress for a rival bridge. Capital said, "There is not a sufficient amount of business to warrant the building of two bridges across the Hudson River, and until you decide to two bridges across the Hudson River, and until you decide to build but a single bridge we will not furnish the capital to proceed with it?" The available of the capital to proceed with it?" The engineers in charge of that work say that there are no reasons in the world why they shall not span the entire river with a suspension bridge. Why not then amend the pending bridge bill so as to enable this company to span the entire river with a suspension or any other bridge of that kind that they see fit to make?

I have no objection to the passage of the bill. The gentlemen who are interested in this bridge are my friends. The gentlemen interested in the other bridge are my friends. I am as anxious to assist my friends in all their business enterprises, where they are consistent with the public interest, as any man possibly can be, and I make no distinction between the two bridges. I favor this bridge as much as I favored the other, and with like restrictions as to piers, I will vote for it quite as freely; but I would resign my place in the Senate before I would vote for a bill that would tend to put an obstruction in that great water way, the Hudson River at New York, in the manner that

The Senator from Delaware has stated here a case where water was passing up by the action of the tide. Let me apply it to this particular location. It is proposed here not only to give permission to this company, remember, to put a pier in the river, but it is proposed to permit the other company also to put a pier in the river. What would be the effect of it? Let me say to the Senator from Delaware I have seen the ice blocked up in the Hudson River for miles above Jersey City. If these piers are put in the river it will absolutely block out the tidal current, especially when there is ice in the river, for when the tide comes in it blocks the ice which comes down the Hudson River. These piers would make a lodgment for it, and it would be impossible for the ice to be dislodged from these structures placed in the river; and therefore only one-half of the tidal cur-rent necessary to scour out the great water way for ships at Sandy Hook would come into the river.

The Board of Engineers of the War Department have required even in building the piers on the New York and the New Jersey side that the largest amount of areashould be left to the storing of the tidal currents that come in from the ocean, in order that when the tidal currents pass out they shall scour the channel through which the great vessels are obliged to go. I ask the Senate to consider the great steamship lines with a steamship 600 feet long of 8,000 tons displacement, going to and from Liverpool and Southampton and Havre and all European ports, carrying only about one-half a cargo, because of the fact that the water is too shoal at the entrance to let the ship go out with a full cargo, and they are obliged to sail with half a load of

freight.

Mr. GEORGE. Where is that?

Mr. McPHERSON. I am speaking of the channel down at Sandy Hook, where the water is shoal and where the sand wishes down from above and fills up the channel.

Mr. President, these ships, as I said, can get neither in or out except at a very high tide, and then with only half a load. Now it is proposed to shut out a part of the tide in order that you may limit it still more, and to that extent increase the transportation cost of the products that we send abroad. And now I portation cost of the products that we send abroad. And now I ant to say something as to what the Maritime Association of

New York have to say about that matter.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator mean to say that it would increase the price of cotton and wheat sent abroad?

Mr. McPHERSON. I say it would increase the freight

Mr. GEORGE. I thought the Senator said it would increase the price

Mr. McPHERSON. If I did not say it I say it now, and emphasize it now; it necessarily increases the cost of transportation when only half a cargo is possible. Mr. GEORGE. I thought the Senator said it would increase the price of those products?

Mr. McPHERSON. If I made such a statement it was a mistake, and I beg the Senator's pardon. I have now corrected it.

The Maritime Association, speaking of the act passed by the New York Legislature, say:

New York Legislature, say:

It was not until 1890 that an act was passed at Albany incorporating the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company, and then it stipulated that:

"the said bridge shall be constructed with a single span over the entire river." No piers were to be permitted outside the established pier-head lines on either side. This condition was deemed essential to the interests of New York. The State had connected the Hudson River with the great West by means of the Eric Canal, and would not allow that magnificent water way upon which commercial New York depends, to be obstructed at its very outlet. But since then the company has repeatedly sought to obtain authority from Congress to build a bridge with piers. In 1890 their bill was adversely reported both in Senate and House. At every session since it has been offered, only to meet adverse action in Senate committee, and fail of passage. Now it again appears, and it again should suffer defeat. Its promoters seek to violate the distinct prohibition of piers in the North River as conditioned in the New York charter, as well as the rights of all the navigation interests of this port and its northern and western connections.

We should not be understood as opposing North Hiver bridges. On the contrary, we favor them. They are a necessity, but it is equally a necessity that they be only with a single span across the river.

It says:

This bill is worded so as to conceal its true intent. Its stipulation is that; "No pier shall be built on the New York side of said river outside of the existing pier-head line, and on the New Jersey side only at such a point as will make a clear water way of not less than 2,000 feet from the pier located on the New Yorkside." This places the pier dangerously near the middle of the river. A proviso follows: "That nothing herein contained shall be construed as taking away from the Secretary of War the right to require a greater width of span than 2,000 feet," but as Secretary Lamont has informally approved the plans, the enactment of the measure would fix the pier near the middle of the river, contrary to the stipulation of the New York Legislature and against the interests of the port.

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, let me ask how does this voluntary Maritime Association in New York know about what the Secretary of War has formally approved or informally It is a mere assertion.

approved? It is a mere assertion.

Mr. McPHERSON. They speak of a public document which was handed to me first in the Senate Chamber and is floating about the Capitol and afterwards in the War Department by the Secretary of War himself. There were no secrets about it. It was signed by an engineer named Adams, I think, and it was forwarded here by the Secretary of War himself. I presume the Maritime Association would find no difficulty in getting processes for of such a decument, as it was public property. possession of such a document, as it was public property.

The report of the House Committee on Commerce upon the bill shows that the consequence of its passage are not realized. It says: "It is fair to say that the New Jersey side of the river does not embrace the main channel, and by the recent order of the Treasury is set apart for an anchorage ground for vessels, thus taking it out of the navigable part of the river, so that any pier which might be constructed or allowed to be constructed by the Secretary of War would not interfere with the navigation of the river."

That is unwittingly—

Says the Maritime Association-

a strong argument against the bill. Its introduction shows the unpractical character of the report, and displays lack of information as to the needs of shipping. For the very reason that the pier is proposed to be placed in the anchorage grounds, the pier renders a considerable portion of the anchor-are grounds useless.

No large vessels could safely drop their anchor nearer than 1,200 feet of it. It therefore becomes as effective an obstruction for anchorages as if it were more than a semicircle of 2,400 feet in diameter.

Equally untenable is the assertion that the main channel is on the New York side. On the contrary, the pier is placed in the channel, with ample depth of water on the west side as well as on the east, for the largest ships that float.

The committee also expresses the opinion—

And here is a matter to which I want to call the attention of the Senate especially-

The committee also expresses the opinion that without such a pier it would be impossible to construct the bridge; or that its cost would be so enormous as to make it a financial impossibility. Therein they differ from engineers and capitalists who propose the other North River bridge without a pier, with a single span, both longer and with greater capacity than this,

Now, then, here comes the special point that the Maritime Association makes as against this bridge:

Again they say "snow and ice in the winter and fogs at other seasons of the year, frequently render the crossing of the river almost impossible and very unsafe."

the year, frequently render the crossing of the river almost impossible and very unsafe.

This assertion is so true that it constitutes one of the chief objections to the bill. A stone pier is proposed to be placed in one of the chief highways of commerce. Not merely ferry boats, but craft of all kinds are constantly passing, tows, lighters, passenger steamers, elevators, rafts. The pier according to the plan, is to occupy a square of 200 feet. In fogs it will be a constant source of peril to life and property affoat. In winter it will obstruct the passage of ice. Experience shows that it es accumulates around piers, and the result would be the frequent closing of the river to navigation. Again, who can doubt that if the proposed pier were a natural rock in the middle of the North River, like Diamond Reef off the battery, or Pot Rock in Heil Gats, to remove which millions have been spent, neither Congress nor the State nor the city would rest until it were effectually destroyed so as to render the navigation of the channel perfectly safe and clear. We have one of the finest streams in the world, with a commerce that has made New York the Empire City and the Empire Sit, si, but this bill proposes to erect almost a tits mouth a tower that would be a monument to the folly of the people permitting it.

Another case in point are the Smith and Windmill Islands in Philadelphia Herbor, that are to-day being removed from the channel at a cost of millions of dollars.

Now, Mr. President, the water where they propose to locate these piers is very deep on the Jersey side, and I have somewhere seen it stated that in building the bridge across the Firth of Forth in Scotland the size of the pier was 430 feet in one direction and 280 feet in the other. So you can follow it. Further, in a criticism in the Engineering News, a competent authority which I believe nobody questions, it is stated that it would re quire quite as large a foundation here as it does at the Firth of Forth, because that was a solid rock with nearly perpendicular sides, and it would require as much space here to be occupied by a pier in the body of the river. Therefore you can form some kind of an idea as to how much of an obstruction it is to become.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator inform the Senate what class of persons compose the Maritime Association of New York?

Does he know?

Mr. McPHERSON. The Maritime Association of New York is composed of shipowners, people who manage ships, all of the commerce transportation interests of the portand harbor of New York, together with the foreign commerce and the domestic com-York, together with the foreign commerce and the doinestic commerce up and down the coast. I do not suppose you could find in any country in the world a more respectable body of men in point of character and ability than the Maritime Association of New York. With respect to transportation it is exactly like the board of trade or the chamber of commerce with respect to objects which make commerce. One represents the commerce itself, that is, the transportation itself, the other represents the products which make commerce. There is no doubt, I will say to the Senator, as to the character and qualifications of these

Mr. GEORGE. They are supposed to know all about it?
Mr. McPHERSON. Surely. Let it be remembered by the Senator [Mr. Hill] that the State of New York itself, in its Legislature, denied to this company the right to put a pier in that river, and if the application were made to-day it would be denied. Remember the legislation in New Jersey was made in 1868, even before the Brooklyn Bridge was built, and it was not supposed at that time that a bridge could be built with a very long span; but Roebling demonstrated that between New York long span; but Roebling demonstrated that between New York and Brooklyn, and he has built a bridge there with a 1,600-foot span, and I think Roebling to-day will tell you that he can build a bridge with a span of 3,000 feet as readily as one of 1,600 feet.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator wish to be understood as saying that the Legislature of New York denied to this bridge company the right to put a pier in the Hudson River?

Mr. McPHERSON. Most assuredly, and more than that this company relies upon its charter obtained from New Jersey, simply because that old charter permitted piers to be built 1,000 feet apart in the river; and as it could not be more than half the river in any event, here come the gentlemen whom my friend from New York is representing here as the incorporators of this company, and when they come to ask their own Legislature for a bill permitting them to bridge the river with piers, ture for a bill permitting them to bridge the river with piers, the Legislature not only said, you shall not put piers upon the New York side of the river, but you shall not put them upon the New Jersey side of the river; there shall be a span over the entire river.

Mr. WHITE of California. Has the Senator a copy of that

Mr. McPHERSON. I have it here. I will read it. Mr. WHITE of California. I do not wish to disturb the line

Mr. WHITE of California. I do not wish to disturb the line of the Senator's argument.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I have a copy of it.

Mr. GEORGE. This is a very important matter and it is a very instructive debate. I suggest the want of a quorum. The Senate ought to be here to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi suggests the want of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their papers: swered to their names:

Allen,	Frye,	Martin,	Sherman,
Bate,	Gallinger,	Mills,	Shoup,
Berry,	George,	Mitchell, Wis.	Stewart,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Palmer,	Stockbridge
Brice,	Gorman,	Peffer,	Teller,
Caffery,	Hale,	Perkins,	Turpie,
Cameron,	Harris,	Pettigrew,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Power,	Vilas.
Colso.	Hill.	Pugh,	Voorhees,
Daniel,	Kyle,	Quay.	Walthall,
Dubois.	Lindsay,	Ransom,	White, Cal.
Faulkner.	McPherson,	Roach.	White, La.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. Senator from New Jersey will proceed.

Mr. McPHERSON. In order that I may be exactly correct.

let me read from a letter received this morning from one of the members of the maritime association:

The New York charter, given on pages 9 to 14, contains in paragraph 24 the distinct provision for a single span over the entire river and prohibits plers in the river within the established pler-head lines.

This provision was inserted at the behest of the navigation interests, who opposed the bridge bill in Albany at that time, and who wishdrew their opposition after paragraph 24 was changed to meet their views.

It was to span the river.

Now, it appears that that company intended it merely as a blind, and the claim is made now that the State of New York has no right to legislate beyond its boundary, and that paragraph 4 is void. But nevertheless it ought to be regarded as a distinct declaration of the policy of the State of New York toleave the North River at New York City unobstructed by bridge plers; and it is quite certain that if the State of New Jorsey could legislate on this master now (which it can not under the constitution adopted in 1876, prohibiting special legislation), it would also prohibit plers in the river.

Mr. HILL. Does the Senator mean to tell the Senate that the constitution of New Jersey by the prohibition of special legislation prohibits an amendment of the charter?

Mr. McPHERSON. I have not stated it. I am only reading what the gentleman says.

Mr. HILL. I understood the Senator to say they could not amend their previous charter in a particular way. I say the prohibition of special legislation does not prevent the Legisla-I say the promotion of special legislation does not prevent the Legislature of New Jersey from amending a previous special act.

Mr. McPHERSON. I am only reading a gentleman's letter, who seemingly does not understand the power of the New Jersey Legislature as well as the Senator and myself. They certainly would have the power to amend the act.

Mr. VEST. May Lintanguet the Senator and selections.

Mr. VEST. May I interrupt the Senator from New Jersey?
Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.
Mr. VEST. The Senator certainly knows what his Legislature has done in the past. I ask him if that charter has not been amended three times within twenty years by the Legislature of New Jersey, and the amendment approved by the attorney-general of the State and the governor of the State?

Mr. McPHERSON. I prefer not to speak on that subject at all. I know nothing about it. I understand it to have been revived only, and yet the Senator may be correct in saying that new powers were given in subsequent acts.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator made a statement a little while ago which I did not exactly catch about the probable size of one of these piers and how much of an obstruction it would be in the river.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will read from the engineer's report what would be the size of the pier of the North River Bridge Company, the one which was chartered three years ago, and that is located within the pier line. It is 340 feet one way by 180 feet the other; and surely with a pier to be located in the river at an elevation of a thousand feet out from the Jersey shore in deep water, with a silt bottom very largely, which necessarily would require caiseons to be put down perhaps 150 feet for a foundation to bear this great cantalever structure or system reaching out a thousand feet from the pier line in both directions, I can not imagine that it could be less in size than that proposed by the North River Bridge Company.

I will state further as to the cantalever bridge across the Firth of Forth in Scotland, which is a bridge of like character with this proposed bridge, the Engineering News gives the foundation:

The dimensions of such a bridge pier in the North River can certainly not be less than those of the Brooklyn Bridge—140 by 60 feet—near the water line, but, on account of the more exposed location of wind storms, it must be made larger. It was necessary in the case of the Forth bridge, in Scotland, for this reason to make the towers very wide at the base, requiring a group of four piers, each 80 feet in diameter, and the middle tower occupying an area of 430 by 230 feet, for which an existing rocky island was util-

Mr. GEORGE. That answers my question. Mr. McPHERSON. Now as to the argument that this engineer uses. He says:

That company also uses the argument that at their location a bridge pier is admissible because it would be on anchorage ground. But as new docks are all the time building from both sides of the river farther north it will only be a question of time when the whole river front on both sides, from Fort Washington and Fort Lee down, will be occupied by docks, and when the anchorage ground will be moved further north. A bridge pier, occupying an acre and a half of space and forming a veritable island, would be a serious menace to navigation.

The statement which is made on page 2 of the inclosed House report from Mr. Geaux that a single span bridge—

Now, here is a thing that has frightened this company-That a single-span bridge would cost over $100,000,000 is a misrepresenta-tion.

I now read from the engineer of the North River Bridge Company. Mr. HILL.

Mr. HILL. The opposition bridge company.
Mr. McPHERSON. Very well; the opposition bridge company, if you please. He says:

pany, if you prease. Lie says.

If that company would invite competitive plans from engineers and bridge builders for single-span bridges of $1,00-foot span, which is nearly the same at that location as for the North River bridge at Hoboken, it would soon be shown that a single-span bridge, for fast railroad trains on six tracks, could be readily and economically built on that location for about $20,000,000. Their demand for a pier in the river is caused by the desire to get a greater privilege than the North River Bridge Company has obtained, and to use this advantage in selling their bonds on the representation that their bridge will costless.

And so on. Speaking further, he says of the single-span bridge:

It is not true that single-span bridges over the North River above Hoboken can not be built.

And take to-day the consensus of opinion of nearly all the great engineers of the world and they will tell you that it is not impossible, but entirely feasable.

It is an old story which was told when Roebling proposed to bridge the East River to Brooklyn with a single span. Almost all other engineers in the country at that time considered him visionary and his scheme impracticable. But his judgment has been vindicated by the completion of his bridge and by the building of a much larger bridge in Scotland, namely, the Forth bridge, near Edinburgh, having two larger spans (1,700 feet each) than the Brooklyn bridge with a 1,600-foot span.

The span I suppose for each of the arms would be about a thousand feet if it is built in accordance with this bill. A pier on the New York side of the river would carry a cantalever half way over, opening not less than 2,000 feet I suppose. Senators understand how these cantalever bridges are built. They join together with arms from the two piers. They join together in the middle, and are supported, of course, upon strong piers and braces from above, and it is almost a perfect balance, with an arm running in opposite directions.

Now, Mr. President, it is shown that even the Firth of Forth bridge is much larger than is proposed here, even if you wish to build a cantalever bridge, but there is no necessity for putting a pier in that river at all.

Mr. LINDSAY. With permission, I will ask the Senator from New Jersey if the act of the Legislature of New Jersey prohibits

New Jersey if the act of the Legislature of New Jersey prohibits a pier from being put in the river?

Mr. McPHERSON. The act of the New Jersey Legislature, I will say to the Senator, was passed in 1868. Then the line between New York and New Jersey had not been definitely defined, and it allowed them to build one or more piers a thousand feet apart. That act was passed at a time when there was no attention paid to bridge building, and the New Jersey Legislature I think to-day would not think of passing any such act.

The New Jersey bridge charter required that consent should first be obtained from the State of New York for like powers and privileges from that State before a bridge could be constructed.

first be obtained from the State of New York for like powers and privileges from that State before a bridge could be constructed. It was not obtained until 1890. In 1890 the State of New York absolutely denied to the company the right to put a pier in the river, and they made it a condition that the whole river should be spanned. They were not given power even to build one at the New Jersey end of the bridge except upon the condition that there should be no pier in the river anywhere. That was the demand of the Maritime Association; that was the demand of the of New York; and not only that, but they could not even mand of the Maritime Association; that was the demand of the people of New York; and not only that, but they could not even place a railroad track upon their bridge. Now, this charter gives them power to put railroad tracks upon the bridge. They come here and get it from Congress. It is not such a permit under some general system of laws, such as the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] a year or two ago had passed here for bridge building across the Western rivers. That was a well-guarded bill in the interest of navigation, while this is a bill to destroy navigation. destroy navigation.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.
Mr. HILL. A bill was passed by Congress a few years ago for a rival bridge company, if I may use that term, expressly providing that it should be a railroad bridge.
Mr. McPHERSON. Yes, sir; and let me describe to the Senator what kind of a bridge that was.
Mr. BRICE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a ques-

Mr. McPHERSON. I will. Mr. BRICE. Was there not a limitation in the bill passed in 1890 providing that some work must be done before July 1, 1893; otherwise the charter would fail. Do I understand that that time has not been extended?

Mr. McPHERSON. I understand it has been extended.
Mr. VEST. It was extended for twelve months.
Mr. McPHERSON. I do not want any member of the Senate to understand me as opposing this charter. I will gladly and freely vote for a charter to these people on the same terms exactly that I voted for the other charter. I do not want to restrict bridge building across the Hudson River. I am not an advocate of one company more than another. I say that you have given to the other company the power to bridge by a single span. Give it to this company, and under no consideration give to either company the power to interfere with the navigation of

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will allow me, it was claimed by the friends of the North River Bridge Company that they ought to have the same rights as this company, and at the instance of gentlemen who are friendly to that company this very bill has given that bridge company the same rights. The Senator from New Jersey ought to state that for the benefit of the Senate. So far as that branch of the argument is concerned both companies stand upon an equality. I doubted the propriety of mixpanies stand upon an equality. I doubted the propriety of mixing up the charters of the two bridge companies in one bill, but the committee thought otherwise. It was a unanimous report.

Mr. McPHERSON. Speaking of the North River Bridge Company, when they came to the War Department and to Congress they adopted a plan and that plan showed exactly how much they were to do by way of approaches. It was only to drop from the level of the bridge down to join and connect with drop from the level of the bridge down to join and connect with the soil beneath. They did not have any permission to run all over the country, but only a bridge to cross the river and sufficient approaches for trains and vehicles to get on the bridge. The distance, as the Senator from New York knows, between Hoboken and the hills, we call them the bluff, is scarcely less than from where we sit down to the foot of the Capitol grounds. There is a level plain, and beyond that is a hill two or three hundred feet high. The bridge would necessarily be built from the bank of the river on an elevation until it reached the bluff. It would interfere with no traffic there, and in the city of New York it could not move a step under the laws of the city of New York unless it secured its authority from the municipal authori-

Now, I want the bridge bill to be passed, but I do say that I am sure every Senator will find if these piers are put in the river that they will be destructive to the navigation of the stream. There is no reason for it except it will save this company perhaps $10,000,000 or $15,000,000 in the construction of their work, and to that extent rob the commerce of the country of more than a hundred million dollars before the end comes, because we are not legislating for a thing that is to last a week or a month, we are legislating for all time for the greatest commercial city in the United States, a city where the railroads of this country, the great trunk lines of railroad which wander far and wlide over the States and Territories of the great West, bring the products of the West and land them there at our very doors. It is the spot where imports and exports meet for exchange; where these great steamship lines come in and discharge their freight directly on the ears to be transported West, and they discharge in like manner the freight which is brought from the West is discharged into ships immediately at the dock.

Let me show what the Engineering News says on the effect of these piers. I shall read it, so that there may be no mistake as to the exact words:

as to the exact words:

The North or Hudson River at New York City, is the principal harbor of the United States. Its navigation has distinctly the character of harbor navigation, combined with river navigation: that is, the vessels not only pass up and down, as on a river, but crosswise, from shore to shore, and diagonally, as in a harbor. The large ocean ateamships must have room to swing in and out of their docks and slips, and chiefly for this reason the anchoring of vessels in the river is prohibited. Some of these steamers are 560 feet long, and steamers will undoubtedly soon appear of a length of over 600 feet, requiring the full unobstructed width of the river at any point for their evolutions. Two of the White Star steamers are 582 feet long, two of the Imman steamers 566 feet, while the new Cunard steamers will be 630 feet long, and the new Imman steamers probably about the same length.

From year to year the region devoted to wharves and docks is extending upward, and probably will in future : equire the entire water front of the city. Besides, the United States Government is cutting a canal from the North River to the Harlem River for the purpose of giving direct entrance to ocean craft from Long Island Sound through the Harlem River into the North River, which will thus more than ever require to be free from midriver obstructions. The time of greatest danger to navigation is during the frequent fogs in the harbor. Collisions are of almost daily occurrence, in spite of all possible precautions, as shown by the reports of the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, but a collision of two ships can never be oldsastrous as a collision of ship and bridge pier.

The maneuvering and steering of vessels intersecting each other's courses is very much complicated by any immovable obstruction, such as bridge piers in a harbor, even in clear weather, and becomes a matter of very serious danger in icy or foggy weather; so much so that if nature had planted piers or rock islands in the North River the Government

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New York to what would have been the effect if this proposed pier had been in the river at the time of our great naval parade, when the naval vessels lay at anchor in the Hudson River up about Seventieth and Seventy-second streets, and even as far as Eightieth street, New York. The Engineering News tells us that one of the modern ships of commerce, a ship 600 feet long, lying at anchor with her cable chains almost as long, would require, to swing with the tide, a space of 1,200 feet.

Within 1,200 feet of that pier, up and down the river, a vessel can not be anchored, and a vessel can not be anchored between the pier and the New Jersey shore, because it is only 1,000 or 1,100 feet from the shore, although the water is deep enough.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes. Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if the exact point at which the bridge is to touch the New Jersey shore is cated in the bill?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes; sufficiently definite for our purpose.
Mr. GEORGE. I ask, further, if that part of the shore is used for the landing and anchorage of vessels and for the loading and unloading of vessels?

Mr. McPHERSON. If there is a single vacant pier or space wide enough for a pier for 6 miles from the very point where the bridge crosses I do not know of it, and I think I am very onversant with that whole locality.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the commerce go above the place?

Mr. McPHERSON. It goes up near to the pier where this bridge will be located. And every year adds new piers for com-

Mr. GEORGE. Are railroads concentrated there?
Mr. McPHERSON. The great railroad companies and the largest coal industry in the city of New York is near where it is proposed this bridge shall cross, or a little below the point, and there are the great terminal facilities of the New York and Erie Railroad, the West Shore Railroad, the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western, another trunk line, then comes the great the Railroad and Ohio, the Lebigh Val. Pennsylvania system, the Baltimore and Ohio, the Lehigh Valley, together with great steamship lines, and more coming every year, all located on the Jersey side of the river.

In speaking of the location along the river, I am speaking of the trunk lines of railroad, which absorb the whole water front for a mile below Jersey City, up almost to the very point where the bridge is proposed to be placed. Mr. VEST. Does the Senator from New Jersey mean to answer the question of the Senator from Mississippi by stating that the proposed bridge has been located?

Mr. McPHERSON. I understand that the bridge has been located, and plans had been filed.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Mississippi will look at the bill, he will find that there is no location of the bridge; it is not to be below Sixty-sixth street, and its location is subject to the approval of the Secretary of War. That is all there is on that Mr. McPHERSON. There has been no secret about the lo-

Mr. MCPHERSON. There has been no secret about the location of the bridge, as I understand.
Mr. VEST. I do not know where it is to be located.
Mr. GEORGE. I do not know whether the Senator from New Jersey is the proper person of whom to ask the question which I desire to propound, but I ask the question generally, what is the propriety of leaving to the Secretary of War the location of the pier on the New Jersey side of the river, whilst it is definitely fixed on the New York side?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to have some other Senator

Mr. McPHERSON. I should like to have some other Senator answer that question. I can not answer it.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask the Senator if there is anything in this bill which authorizes any pier to be put in the river on the New Jersey side?

Mr. McPHERSON. I think there is.

Mr. VEST. No, there is not.
Mr. LINDSAY. Is not this bill intended to be a merelicense by the Federal Government to construct across a navigable stream a bridge which could not otherwise be constructed; and does not the bill provide in express terms that the structure is to conform to the laws of New York and New Jersey; and is not the provision as to the piers and spans a limitation upon the power of the Secretary of War; and is not the Secretary of War authorized to require the piers and spans to be constructed as he may think the necessity of commerce requires?

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is supposed that the Secretary of War has already given his approval. The bill had been submitted to the Department at least and report made.

the Department at least, and report made. the Department at least, and report made.

Mr. VEST. I denythat, Mr. President, absolutely. It would be an outrage for a Cabinet officer to give his approval of a bill before it is submitted to him as an act of Congress; it is an outrage upon the Secretary of War that such a statement should be made. He would be subject to impeachment if he should do such a thing as to say in advance to the company, "I approve your bill before Congress has passed upon it." The Chief Engineer comes before our committees and says that he proposes to exercise the discretion given to him in this bill, and that no pier shall be placed there which will obstruct navigation. I am surshall be placed there which will obstruct navigation. I am surprised that the Senator from New Jersey makes such a state-

Mr. McPHERSON. I presume the Senator has in his committee room a copy of that report. Unfortunately I have not the paper before me this morning; but it is not an unusual thing for committees of the Senate to submit important matters to the Departments for information and criticism; and the evidence is here that the Board of Engineers recommended amendments, which the committee adopted, to this very bill. His plea of impeachment comes very late. Let me say to the Senator it has always been done since I have been in the Senate, and never did

I hear it criticised before.

Mr. VEST. I have stated it again and again, and it seems to make no impression upon the Senator from New Jersey. Does he mean to say that a report from an engineer or a set of engineers is absolutely compulsory on the Secretary of War? Does he not know that the reports have been rejected time and again in regard to bridges over navigable streams? Yet the Senator persists in the statement that the Secretary of War has in advance of any legislation by Congress approved of this bill. I deny it. I have too much respect for Mr. Lamont to believe that he would do any such thing.
Mr. MCPHERSON. The Cong

Mr. McPHERSON. The Congress of the United States are given direction, supervision, and control over the navigable waters of this country. I want to know if the Senator from Missouri is willing to abdicate his power and responsibility and allow a bill of this kind to pass, which seemingly on the one hand authorizes the Secretary of War to do a certain thing and in another clause of the bill says he need not do it unless he desires to do so. This is not treating the Secretary

Mr. VEST. I will answer the Senator from New Jersey. Mr. VEST. I will answer the Senator from New Jersey.
Mr. McPHERSON. In other words, I think the true construction of this bill would impel the Secretary of War, if the Board of Engineers should decide favorably to it, to proceed to execute the law, and we are told here that the Chief of the Board of Engineers has been present in the committee room and has given his assent to the bill. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM] made that statement, and unless the Secretary therefore repudiates the advice of the Board of Engineers he will hardly see his way out of the difficulty.

Mr. GEORGE. The question I propounded to the Senator from New Jersey was based upon the following language contained in the bill: "And no pier shall be built on the New York side of the river outside of the existing pier-head line;" which I understand to be the structure for the loading and unloading of Is that correct?

Mr. McPHERSON. Yes.
Mr. GEORGE. The bill continues: "And on the New Jersey side only at such a point as will make a clear water way of not less than 2,000 feet from the pier located on the New York side." less than 2,000 feet from the pier located on the New York side. I understand the river is 3,100 feet wide. So this provision will be complied with by locating the pier on the New York side at a point fixed by Congress, and it would leave to the Secretary of War to locate it on the other side of the river, by putting it 1,100 feet from the shore, whilst on the New York side it would be at the shore. I want to know why the distinction is made between the State of New York and the State of New Jersey in

Mr. McPHERSON. The company have the idea that they can not span the river with their bridge for more than 2,000 feet. They knew that the State of New York would not brook it. The Legislature of that State denied them the right and they fell back upon the power granted to them in 1868 in an old New Jerback upon the power granted to them in 1868 in an old New Jersey charter for the power to locate a pier on the New Jersey side when the New York Legislature denied them the right, and now they ask Congress to help them out.

I desire to say that I do not wish to throw any hindrance or obstacle in the way of a vote upon this bill, but the amendment I have offered providing that the board of freeholders of the county of Hudson shall have charge over the approaches to the bridge I think is proper. I should like to have a vote upon that question, and then I should like to have a vote upon another amendment which I shall send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. VEST. Let the other amendment he acted upon first

Let the other amendment be acted upon first. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. VEST. I want to be heard upon that amendment, if the Senate will permit me. Is the Senator from New Jersey through? Mr. McPHERSON. I am until I offer the amendment which

Mr. HILL. Are there any other amendments to be offered to

Mr. FRYE. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will not offer the other amendment until we have disposed of the first amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, which has been hear

Mr. VEST. Then I shall take the floor, Mr. President. I have had considerable experience with the necessary lation by Congress with regard to the construction of bridges over navigable streams. The duty has been imposed upon me for over ten years, as chairman of the subcommittee of bridges of the Committee on Commerce, to give attention to this matter; and I can say without any hesitation that it is simply impossible to give permission to any corporation to construct a bridge over a navigable stream without a contest between the navigation interests and the bridge interests. Every bridge is necessarily in a larger or smaller degree an obstacle to navigation. I might say that there is a natural antagonism between the rights of navigation and those of railroad companies who desire to cross navigable streams with their tracks.

It is a very wise provision of the Constitution which gives the arbitrating power to Congress. There is no provision in the Constitution reposing power in the legislative department which receives greater illustration of its efficacy and propriety at every session of Congress. Unfortunately the Senator from New Jersey seems to be under the impression that this is a local ques-York has done and what the Legislature of New York has done and what the Legislature of New Jersey has done.

I care nothing for the acts of either.

My construction of the power of Congress, as given by the Constitution, is that we shall pass in each instance upon the issue as to whether navigation will be interfered with by the construction of a proposed bridge. As to what may occur upon either side of a river, as to the railroads which may come to a bridge, and as to what streets in a municipality these roads shall be upon, Congress, in my judgment, has nothing whatever to do. Our responsibility and power are confined entirely to the question as I have stated it, whether the proposed bridge structure interferes with the navigation of a navigable stream.

I opposed the charter for the North River bridge because that company came to Congress and asked us to usurp, in my judgment, the functions of the States Legislatures and to create a corporation. They ought to have gone to the States of New York and New Jersey, one or either or both, in order to get their charter. In the present instance, this company has a charter both from New York and from New Jersey.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. George] asks why it was that that the New York side of the pier was prohibited outside of the pier-head line, whereas on the New Jersey side there was no such limitation. I will answer him very frankly. The act of the Legislature of New York prohibited any pier outside of the pier-head line, and the act of the Legislature of New Jersey did no such thing. It is a remarkable fact that the charter of this company has been amended three times in two years, as the Senator from New Jersey knows and admitted and these the Senator from New Jersey knows and admitted, and these amendments were approved by the chief executive and the attorney-general of that State, and that no such prohibition as to piers outside of the pier-head line on the Jersey side was put in those amendments.

Mr. GEORGE. By the New Jersey Legislature?

Mr. VEST. By the New Jersey Legislature.
Mr. McPHERSON. I do not think the Senator is correct when he says the act was amended. I think the act was revived.
It expired either by limitation or by lack of attention in paying the fees, taxes, etc., to the State; but I think the legislation of which the Senator speaks was not to revive the act in any sense which gave additional authority about piers in the river.

Mr. VEST. It does not break the force of my argument that the amendment simply revived the act. The point I make is that the attention of the Legislature of New Jersey was called to this charter, and if they had considered the provision as to piers important and necessary they would have amended the original charter, which they did not do.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, if he will allow me.

a question, if he will allow me.
Mr. VEST. With great pleasure.
Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator to say that the constitutional power which Congress had was simply to grant a license or privilege to build a bridge over a navigable stream.
Mr. VEST. Yes.
Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that it would be perfectly competent for Congress under the provisions of the Constitution, to prescribe the regulations for the operation of bridges over navigable streams over which persons may travel and railroads be constructed?

Mr. VEST. I suppose Congress could put conditions upon the Mr. VEST. I suppose Congress could put conditions upon the construction of a bridge, if the Senator means that; and we do that in every bridge bill. We provide that it shall be of such a height, that the spans shall be of such a length, etc.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask if the Senator admits that it would be perfectly competent for Congress in the passage of this bill to prescribe that all railroads which may cross the proposed bridge shall have the same rights?

Mr. VEST. We always do that. That is part of the legitimate power of Congress. Of course, we may provide that other railroads may use the bridge, and if the company which receives the charter and the other companies desiring to use the bridge can not agree, then that question shall be submitted to the Sceretary of War. All these are corollaries from the constitutional power to regulate the bridging of navigable streams. What I mean is that we have no right to go within the legislative jurisdiction of a State and say that a railroad company shall have the right to condemn land according to an act of Congress for the right of way to get to a bridge: or that their tracks shall be of much a width on that their tracks shall be of such a width or that their tracks shall be of such a height.

Mr. ALLEN. I fully concur with the Senator.
Mr. VEST. That is all I mean to say.
I opposed the North River bridge because, in my judgment, it usurped the functions of a State Legislature; I fought it in tommittee and fought it on this floor, but I was overruled by a majority of the committee and of the Senato. I opposed the provision in this bill as originally offered, that the municipality of New York should have contain news over the connections of of New York should have certain powers over the connections of this bridge; in other words, I contend that Congress has no right to say that the municipality of New York shall be vested with other powers than the State Legislature has given them. That is all of it. I sympathize with all that can be said against the grant of extraordinary powers by Congress in derogation of the rights of a State Legislature.

Mr. GRAY. If I understand the Senator from Missouri, this bill is not a bill which attempts to charter a bridge company and to authorize and control the operations of a bridge, but it is merely to remove any objection which the United States may have, by reason of its control of the navigable waters of the United States, to the erection of a bridge by a corporation already au-thorized by the States of New Jersey and New York to make that construction.

Mr. VEST. If I understand the Senator's question, yes. Mr. GRAY. That, I believe, is the situation. Mr. VEST. All that I intended to do in my legislative action, Mr. VEST. All that I intended to do in my legislative action, in the Committee on Commerce and here, was to give this company the right to construct a bridge which would not interfere with navigation of that river, that is all; and I opposed every other provision in this bill.

Mr. FRYE. I understood the Senator from Missouri to take the

Mr. VEST. I am coming to that. I have stated what is my opinion generally on the subject of the construction of bridges opinion generally on the subject of the construction of bridges over navigable streams.

The Senator from New Jersey, as I was proceeding to say, has attempted to consider this question as a local matter. It is not a local matter; it is a matter affecting the people of the whole United States. Take, for instance, the citizens of Missouri, who ship large amounts of produce to New York, not only to be consumed in that city, but to be sent abroad. Every impediment to cheap entrance into the city of New York and to gain access to the seaboard of that port is a charge upon the people of my State and upon the corn, wheat, and cattle we send to New York and to foreign countries. As you increase the facilities of transportation, you increase the price which is given to the producer. That proposition is beyond question.

Now, what is the condition of affairs in the great city of New

Now, what is the condition of affairs in the great city of New York? You are forced to cross that river at immense expense, the value of commodities relatively considered. The traveler who goes there must pass from Jersey City on the property of a corporation, a ferryboat, and pay toil every time he crosses that river, and be subjected to immense inconvenience, as every one of us knows, after he has reached the New York side. The of us knows, after he has reached the New York side. whole country is interested in bridging that river. Mr. MCPHERSON. May I ask a question?

Mr. VEST. Certainly. Mr. McPHERSON. It is provided in the bill that the bridge company may charge toll upon the railroad, and the railroad companies, I assume, will charge it back again upon the party who occupies a seat in the car?

Mr. VEST. As a matter of course. Mr. McPHERSON. Therefore, I see no difference whether a railroad company which furnishes the appliances or some one else who furnishes them makes the charge

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from New Jersey does not admit the fact that the greater facility you give to the transportation of either passengers or produce across that river the more it to the interest of the public, then I despair of convincing him of anything.

Mr. McPHERSON. I will answer the Senator in a word if he will permit me to do so.

VEST. Containly.

will permit me to do so.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. McPHERSON. I want to say to the Senator that to-day there is no produce coming from Missouri or any other State in the American Union which would cross that bridge into New York any more than crosses to-day. The great rallroad system there discharges grain upon the New Jersey shore: we take it over to Brooklyn in cars, and deliver it directly to the elevators. It can not be carried across to the New York side. There is no room for freight depots in the heart of the great city of New York; and besides, grain and produce of all kinds must be left upon the shores convenient to water transportation, to be carried by steamships. The bridge is to be one for the accommoried by steamships. The bridge is to be one for the accommodation of passengers, and the carriage of the mails and express freight, and it can not with profit be used for anything else. You can not cart the grain and cattle of Missouri from their proposed station in the heart of the city to the steamship in the harbor. I can not understand how the Senator got that idea into his head.

Mr. VEST. Well, Mr. President, if the Senator prefers it, I shall confine my argument to passengers. Still, I say, that the construction of another bridge, or of a dozen bridges, would be in the interest of the general public throughout the United States. It is absurd, with all respect to the Senator from New Jersey, for him to stand here and state that it would cheapen transportation for either passengers or produce to have but one way of getting into the city of New York. If the Senator chooses to put himself in that attitude, let him do so.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask the Senator as to a question of

Mr. VEST. Certainly, Mr. GEORGE. Is it beyond the engineering science of to-day to build a bridge across the Hudson River without a pier in the middle of it?

Mr. VEST. That is a question which was asked of Col. Casey before the Committee on Commerce, and he frankly confessed that he was not able to reply to it without consulting riparian engineers. Col. Casey is a very able engineer, but not a riparian engineer in the strict sense of the term. There is a riparian engineer in charge of that river, who reports to Col. Casey, and Col. Casey reports to the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of War to Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Then, that part of the case has not been made

Mr. VEST. That part of it. I do not pretend to be an expert, and I only speak with such knowledge as I have derived as chairman of the subcommittee on bridges of the Committee on Commerce, that the span proposed here, if constructed, will be the longest in the world. When Capt. Eads proposed to throw a span of 525 feet in the great St. Louis bridge engineers sneered at the idea and said it was utterly impracticable, but it stands there today and will probably stand there as long as this continent of dures. The longest span that has ever been constructed, even dures. The longest span that has ever been constructed, even under the cantileversystem, is 1,700 feet over the Firth of Forth. One was constructed of 1,500 feet, which was wind-blown and fell, and then another of 1,700 was constructed. The bridge proposed by the pending bill can not be less than 2,000 feet, and as much more as the Board of Engineers may require.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. Coke] asks me a question as to the length of the span of the Memphis bridge. I can not state it accurately, but it is over 600 feet, between 600 and 800 feet. Under the cantilever system, however, the span of the bridge over the Firth of Forth is 1,700 feet, and the proposed bridge, if constructed, I repeat, will be the longest span in the world in

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from Missouri concede the position taken by the Senator from New Jersey to be correct, that the proposed bridge will not be used for freight, but only for passengers?

Mr. VEST. I do not concede it, because the statement made to our committee was directly the opposite. The Senator from New Jersey has made a great many statements, which he doubtless believes, but I do not know on what authority.

Mr. GEORGE. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. VEST. I know that this matter has been repeatedly be fore the Committee on Commerce for five years, and we have the most voluminous testimony coming from different interests in regard to it. One of the main arguments before the Committee on Commerce has been that the construction of this bridge or any other bridge would cheapen the transportation of Western products as they come to New York and the seaboard. I repeat that I should like to see five bridges constructed in stead of two, if they did not obstruct navigation on that river. Competition would necessarily cheapen transportation, and that would be in the interest of the great producing classes of the would be in the interest of the great producing classes of the country. This is especially desirable now when agricultural products are so much depressed in value.

Something has been said here about the North River bridge. I opposed that charter, but I made no opposition to the extension of the time after the company had failed to comply with the limitations prescribed in the original charter, and my personal relations were of the kindest description to the projectors of that bridge. They assured me personally and other members of the committee that if they only got the limitation extended for a very few months they would construct their bridge. The extension was chearfully given to them but the bridge has not been tension was cheerfully given to them, but the bridge has not been constructed.

I have no interest in this matter except as a Senator endeavoring to do his duty to the entire country. I have no prejudice of any sort which would interfere with me to impartially discharge any sort which would interfere with me to impartially discharge my duty as between these warring corporations. All that I want to do, and all that the committee wants to do, permit me to say, is to evolve and bring out of this controversy something which will benefit the people of the whole country, without regard to these local antagonisms and interests.

Mr. MILLS. I simply desire to say that I wish to move an executive session, but I shall not do so if the pending bill can soon be disposed of.

Mr. VEST. We shall soon be able to conclude it.

Mr. VEST. We shall soon be able to conclude it.
Mr. MILLS. Very well.
Mr. VEST. Before I pass away from the subject of the pending amendment, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. George], as he has made an inquiry, and very properly, in regard to the legislation of the State of New Jersey, to an act of the New Jersey Legislature, which I have before me, approved April 17, 1868. I ask the Secretary to read the provision which I have marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

5. And be it enacted. That the said company shall have the power to erect. Construct, and maintain a permanent bridge over the Hudson River, and construct and operate a railroad over the same between some suitable point in the city of New York and a point north of the southerly line of the township of Union, in the county of Hudson, in this State, and to lease, purchase acquire, and hold as much real estate as may be necessary for the site of said bridge, and of all abutments, approaches, walls, tolihouses, and other structures proper to said bridge, and for the opening of suitable evennes to approach to said bridge, and shall also have power to build, erect, and construct a pier for the support of said bridge at the bulkhead line on each side of said Hudson River, and one or two piers in the river between such bulkhead lines with spaces between said piers of not less than 1,000 feet each. Provided, That nothing in this act contained shall be construct to authorize, nor shall authorize, the construction of any bridge which shall obstruct the free and common navigation of the Hudson River, save as herein granted, and such bridge shall not be less than 130 feet elevation above high tide at the middle of the river; it shall not obstruct any public road, street, or avenue which it shall cross, but such public road, street, or avenue shall be opened by a suitable arch or suspended platform as shall give a suitable height for a passage under the same for all purposes of public travel and transportation.

Mr. VEST. That sufficiently explains, it seems to me, why transportation.

Mr. VEST. That sufficiently explains, it seems to me, why no provision was inserted in this bill as to the piers upon the New Jersey side. That act is in full force, and I submit that the Legislature of New Jersey is entirely competent, as was the Legislature of New York, to say what shall be done as to the piers upon the New Jersey side of the Hudson River. If the New Jersey Legislature entertained the same opinion in regard to these piers which seems to be entertained by the Senator from that State, they could easily have made it known, especially within the last two years, when they have three times acted upon this charter. Upon that particular point I have simply a word to say, and then I shall dismiss it.

I should not have favored either in committee or in the Senate

I should not have favored either in committee or in the Senate any bill which proposed to arbitrarily place a pier in that river. There were conflicting opinions and arguments in regard to these plers and in regard to the span of a cantalever bridge. I supposed then, and think now, that the safest way for the Senate of the United States to act upon the matter is to leave this to the better judgment of the Engineer Corps. They are entirely impartial. There is, as I said, a riparian engineer expert in charge of that river. There is no more honest nor impartial. nor conscientious public servant living than Gen. Thomas L. Casey; and this Congress has repeatedly evinced its confidence in him by putting him in charge of large public buildings, and following his judgment in regard to the construction of bridges all over the country, and in not one single instance have we been deceived by him.

Therefore, in this bill is the provision in two places that no bridge shall be constructed there until Gen. Casey, or the head of the Bureau of Engineers, approves it. I grant you that this proposition may be answered by saying: "Gen. Casey may die." My experience with the Engineer Corps is that of all the bureaus of this Government they have been the most exceptionally true to the public interests and honest in the discharge of their duties. I know of but two instances in which engineer officers have been subjected to criticism on account of the manner in which they discharged their public functions.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. Where the piers of a bridge are put in a stream at a point where the water is deep enough for navigation there must necessarily be an obstruction to some extent to navigation, and the question of how much obstruction we will allow in the navigation of a navigable stream seems to me is a political rather than a scientific question.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, if we first establish the scientific premises, then I grant you it is to some extent what the Scientific calls a political discretion, or, I should say, a legislative one.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, legislative.

Mr. VEST. But we must first establish the scientific prem-

Mr. VEST. But we must first establish the scientific premises, that a pier of certain dimensions would produce the effect of which the Senator speaks. Who is the best judge in regard to that? I say the best judge necessarily must be the engineer, or a collection of engineers, in charge of those particular structures on the navigable rivers of the United States.

We do not pass a single bridge bill through Congress in which we do not rely upon the Bureau of Engineers. Every navigable river in the United States is under the charge of a riparian engineer. If that were not so, Congress would be completely at the marcy of the comparty who wanted to

at the mercy of the corporations of the country who wanted to construct bridges.

In this bill I endeavored for myself, and I think the committee endeavored, to follow the universal precedent, which is absolutely necessary, to rely upon the discretion of the engineer in charge of the river. This bill says absolutely and explicitly that the questions of where the pier shall be established and what its dimensions shall be are to be determined by the Bureau of Engineers, who report to the Secretary of War.

what its dimensions shall be are to be determined by the Bureau of Engineers, who report to the Secretary of War.

Another word, Mr. President, and I am done with this matter. In regard to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, I do not know that I am prepared to make strenuous objection to it, although I am inclined to follow the action of the New Jersey Legislature. If they thought it was absolutely necessary to prohibit any pier they would have done so.

I do not like the provision of the bill as to the New York side of the river. I mean the provision in regard to the approaches.

of the river. I mean the provision in regard to the approaches; and I was absolutely opposed to the provision that the connection should be under the control of the municipal authorities of New York. It seems to me that it would have been better-to have passed an ordinary bridge bill and to have left the quesnave passed an ordinary bridge out and to have left the question of approaches and connections to the legislative and municipal authorities in the States of New Jersey and New York; but, still, this is a compromise, and rather than have no bridge over that river, which seems to be likely if this bill shall be defeated, I prefer to accept this provision, though as my colleagues on the committee very well know I did not urge its adoption.

Mr. FRYE. As most of the Senator's argument has been out-on the committee very well know I did not urge its adoption.

Mr. FRYE. As most of the Senator's argument has been outside of the amendment now proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, I want to ask the Senator if the bill provides "that the location of all approaches of said bridge in the city of New York shall be approved by the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of New York," what is the objection or what is the unfairness of the provision asked by the Senator from New Jersey that the location of the bridge on the New Jersey side shall be determined by the commissioners to be appointed there.

Mr. VEST. I have not undertaken to say that it was unfair. I did state that I did not like that provision even as to the New York side; and if I had my choice I would not put any provision of that sort in the bill as to either side of the river. It seems to me that we should simply confine ourselves to our unquestioned jurisdiction, and give the power to construct a bridge which, in our judgment, did not interfere with the navigation of that river. It was urged, however, very plausibly in the committee, that the approaches were a part of the bridge, and that the authorities of New York should have the control of the approaches on that side. I doubted that proposition, and doubt it still. It seems to me the Legislature of New York should define the powers of the municipality of New York, and that Congress has nothing to do with that question. Still, it was impossible to pass the bill without some such provision, and I acceded to it very unwillingly.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GEORGE. After there has been put in the bill a provi-

Mr. GEORGE. Will to

Mr. GEORGE. After there has been put in the bill a provision that the approaches on the New York side shall be under the supervision of the New York authorities, aithough that may have been improper, would it not be fair and equitable and just that the same provision should be inserted as to the New Jersey side?

Mr. VEST. Possibly so. I did not approve very much of either of those provisions. I do not care to dwell any further upon that question. I simply wish to make one remark which I made in the committee, and that is, it seemed to me that the provision that the location of the connections should be approved by the municipality of New York would put it in their power to pre-vent the use of that bridge altogether. I have never heard that argument answered.

Mr. GEORGE. Then that ought to be stricken out of the bill

Mr. VEST. I opposed it; but when I found—every Sevator of any experience here will appreciate what I state—that it was impossible to get any bridge over that river unless we compromised the question, I very unwillingly, as I said before, voted for the report of the bill with that provision in it.

I can only repeat what I have already said as to all these bridge bills, that Congress should confine itself to its constitufunction and not undertake to make laws either for a municipality or a State.

Mr. President, that is the whole of this question so far as I am concerned.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. VEST. Certainly.
Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New Jersey said under its charter, as I understood him, this bridge would be only for passenger traffic.

Mr. VEST. I doubt that. Mr. ALLEN. Then I understand it to be for both freight and assengers. If that be true, as the Senator from Missouri sugpassangers. gests, the bridge affects commerce and affects the nation at large, and the Senator's position is correct.

Mr. VEST. I have only to say what I said before in regard to the statement of the Senator from New Jersey that no produce will be carried over this bridge, that the testimony before the Committee on Commerce was directly opposite to that assertion. I do not think the Senator from New Jersey appeared before our committee in any of the different hearings we have had; and, speaking as a lawyer, the weight of evidence was decidedly against his statement.

I am very willing, however, to confine the transportation to assengers; still I repeat that I should be very glad to have two bridges over that river, or three bridges, or five, in the interests of the whole people of the United States.

Mr. McPHERSON. The Senator is no more willing than I am to build bridges across the Hudson River. I will vote for a general bridge bill, which allows anybody to build bridges across that river, provided no piers are put in the river. I shall vote for the passage of this bill, provided an amendment be agreed to by the Senate which protects the water way. I am perfectly willing to withdraw the amendment I have offered so far as the protection of the soil of New Jersey is concerned from the encroachments of this company, and allow them to go over New Jersey and do what they please; but when it comes to a question in which every Senator is interested, and every State in the In which every Senator is interested, and every State in the Union is interested, as to whether a great national water way, the principal one in the United States, shall be protected, and whether any company of men shall be permitted, or whether the Secretary of War, or the Board of Engineers of the United States, shall be permitted to plant piers in the river, which every man knows tends to obstruct not only the commerce of the barbor and the ice, but block up the river and absolutely deharbor and the ice, but block up the river and absolutely destroy almost one-quarter of the whole capacity of that river for commerce and trade, then and there I stop and call a halt.

Mr. President, if permitted, I withdraw the amendment, as there seems to be objection to it, and I shall offer the amendment which I send to the desk, which simply protects the water way. I ask to have the amendment read.

way. I ask to have the amendment read.
Mr. HILL. Is it understood that the older amendment is withdrawn?

Mr. McPHERSON. Let it be withdrawn. I care nothing about it

Mr. HILL. I want to be heard on the general question. Mr. McPHERSON. Let the amendment I have now proposed Mr. HILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated. The SECRETARY. In clause 3, line 53, after the word "made, it is proposed to insert:

And the said bridge shall be constructed with a single span over the entire river between towers or piers located between the shore and the existing pier-head lines in either State, and no pier or other obstruction to navigation of a temporary or permanent character shall be constructed in the river between said towers or piers.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill, in line 68, on page 4, clause 5, by striking out the word "greater" before the word "pay;" in line 69, after the word "bridge," to strike out "than is allowed per mile to railroads using the same;" in line 72 of clause 6, after the word "all," to strike out "amendments thereof," and insert "laws enacted or to be enacted by Congress;" and in line 75, after the word "structure," to insert "and may be used for necessary military and post-road purposes without compensation." purposes without compensation."

mr. McPHERSON. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to let my amendment be agreed to before he offers his.

Mr. ALLEN. What is the Senator's amendment?

Mr. McPHERSON. The amendment I have offered is simply to require this company and every company to build their bridge without piers.

Mr. HILL. I desire to submit a few words upon the subject of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. VEST. Let that amendment be read.
Mr. HILL. Yes, read it.
The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TURPIE in the chair). The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, strike out all after the word "made" in line 53, and insert:

And the said bridge shall be constructed with a single span over the entire river between towers or piers located between the shore and the existing pier-head lines in either State, and no pier or other obstruction to navigation, of a temporary or permanent character, shall be constructed in the river between said towers or piers.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, this proposed amendment brings up the principal question involved in the bill, and that is, Shall Congress now, with what evidence it has before it, absolutely determine that there shall be no piers whatever in that river? In my judgment Congress might as well then determine that there shall be no bridge. It has been a disputed question among bridge builders and engineers as to whether there can be a bridge constructed over this river with a span more than 2,000 feet in length except at such an expense as will prevent practically the construction of the bridge. I do not say that it can not be done. It involves a large amount of money.

Mr.GEORGE. About how much?

Mr. HILL. Fifty or sixty million dollars. Mr. GEORGE. In addition?

Mr. HILL. No, not in addition. Mr. GEORGE. I should like to know about how much in addition.

Mr. HILL. We asked Gen. Casey the other morning—with the kind courtesy of the committee I was permitted to appear He could not say, because he was not a bridge builder. before it.

Mr. PEFFER. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to suggest to him that engineers have already determined that tubular steel arches can be thrown across a river 3,000 feet wide or more at a weight not to exceed that which is now found to exist more at a weight not to exceed that which is now found to exist in the ropes or cables by which the New York and Brooklyn bridge is suspended. So I think the Senator need not fear the construction of a bridge without any arches in the Hudson River, if he will go to that extent.

Mr. HILL. I simply know the fact that there is no such bridge anywhere in the world. I do not know what engineers may say is possible. They have many schemes and many theories, but I know the fact that as to the span the amendment proposes for this bridge there is no bridge in the world that compares with it. That is conceded. What do we say? We therefore say it is not wise to determine this question absolutely in the pending bill. We submit that the committee which had this matter in charge acted wisely when they said (and that is what the bill proposes) there must be a span of at least 2,000 feet. There is no such span in the world now, but we will assume from what the engineers have said that it is possible. This span must, in the first place, be 2,000 feet, and if the Secretary of War, must, in the first place, be 2,000 feet, and if the Secretary of War, acting in conjunction with the engineers of that Department, concludes that a greater span can be built, and there ought not to be a pier in the river, then the Secretary of War is empowered in his discretion to extend it the full length of 3,100 feet. That is the question involved. Shall we arbitrarily determine that the Secretary of War shall not have this discretion, after consultation with the engineers, interested as much as we are in preserving the navigation of this river? Shall we determine it ourselves or leave it to the Secretary of War and his assistants? That is the question involved in the pending amendment.

Mr. President, in my judgment the best way is to leave it to the Secretary of War, to the officials of the Government. Whom does he consult? He consults the trusted officers of your Army and your Engineer Corps, men who have every interest to protect the public interests and the rights of all the people. In my judgment that is the best and the wisest course to pursue

Now, a word further. I have no more interest in this bill than any other citizen of New York. I have as much interest in it, and more, than any citizen of New Jersey or elsewhere. In my udgment it is a public matter in which we all should take a pubic interest. I have heard this question about obstruction to navigation urged many a time before.

I had the honor of passing upon the question of the construction of the Poughkeepsie Bridge. It was authorized by our Legislature, and it was said by this trumped-up maritime association and boatmen's association and others who come to the front whenever they are wanted in opposition to great measures. that the construction of three piers in the Hudson River at Poughkeepsie, 50 or 75 miles above the city of New York, where the tide ebbs and flows almost upon a dead level from New York to Poughkeepsie, would destroynavigation. Men appeared before me as executive of the State and gave a list of figures to show how the price of transportation would be increased; that it would destroy the navigation of the river, and that there would be accidents upon the river.

I recollect distinctly asking the question upon the hearing on that bill, whether in the construction of the bridge (a portion of it having been constructed, and they wanted authority to extend the time to construct the remainder), when the river had been filled not only with the piers proper, but with the various materials in the construction of it, there had been any accident during the whole time of construction, and there had been none. Men the whole time of construction, and there had been none. Men were proclaiming that in the future there would be accidents all the time, when for three years while being built there had not been one. I recollect distinctly I took time for the consideration of that measure, ten days' time, and during the ten days an old canal boat full of coal was sunk by somebody down there by running against the pier. Evidently it was done by the opponents of the measure. It was altogether too late. There never had been an accident before; there has never been one from that day to the present of any consequence.

That, it is true, is 75 miles above New York City; but it is over the great Hudson River, and the citizens of New York are as anxious as the citizens of any other part of the country to protect a navigable stream, and it is where the tide ebbs and flows. There are those piers; they are not an obstruction to navigation. We have more commerce on that river than there is on the great Mississippi River, as the reports show. It all has to pass down under this bridge.

My friend from New Jersey became alarmed because of the great steamships that would be disturbed or hindered or delayed somewhat. The steamships do not go to Europe by way of Albany; they go the other way, out by Sandy Hook. There are no large steamships that go above the place where this bridge is to be built. They are anchored there only to a very limited extent. There is not a steamship company that has a pier above Twenty-third street. I challenge contradiction. Mr. President, this bill has been before Congress for several years. I care nothing about the individual incorporators. I do not care who they are. I simply know it is a great public measure in which the citizens of my State are interested. The vote on this bill in the other House was unanimous. Every member of the other House from my own State voted for it, possibly with one single exception; I am not certain as to that. Every one of one single exception; I am not certain as to that. Every one of the members of the other House from the Senator's own State, without regard to party, voted for this bill. They saw no danger to the commerce of New York State, or New Jersey, or the country, but all gave it their approval.

My friend has championed the opposition to this measure heretofore. It is true, I know, that he has some personal friends, and he will not deny it, warm personal friends, who are officers of the other bridge company.

of the other bridge company.

Mr. FRYE. Is the other bridge company making any objection to this proposed legislation?

Mr. HILL. I am coming to that in a moment. I think not.
Mr. FRYE. No, sir, not the slightest.
Mr. HILL. Except the Senator from New Jersey is opposing it, and certainly he has been, I think, the friend of the other bridge company.

Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the Opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the Opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the Question of the Opposition of the Now, Mr. President, upon the Question of the Opposition of the Oppo Now, Mr. President, upon the question of the opposition of the Maritime Association, who is their protest signed by? I think I know the prominent men of New York City pretty well. I have seen this list of men before. I saw it the other day. I do not recognize the name of a single citizen of that State of any prominence whatever who makes opposition to the pending bill. I know you get up these boatsmen's associations and they sented. They are easily obtained. They are self-appointed associations. They are simply upon paper, nine-tenths of them, and they read well here, several hundred miles away from New York; but they have no weight at home.

York; but they have no weight at home.

I think I speak for united New York upon this subject. I have heard of no opposition from New Jersey. I have seen no petition, I have heard no petition read here from there. There has been no feeling manifested, such as is described, for the protection of that river. We are as much interested as any one else can be in the protection of the river.

This bill, as I said, has been before Congress on several occasions. In the first place, the local authorities of New York objected to it until just at the close of the last session of the last Congress. They thought they ought to have something to say as to where the bridge should be located, the approaches on the New York side. It is true the bill provides that the bridge shall not be located below Sixty-sixth street on the New York

That is a proper limitation, and nobody objects to it, because it is not expected we are going to build a bridge below that point. That is a sufficient limitation; but the local authorities having in charge the interests of the whole city thought they ought to have something to say about the particular location. Congress has the abstract right to make that limitation and restriction in granting this power. I should have preferred the local authorities not to have made the suggestion of a limitation, but they did, and the friends of the bill conceded the right that they might dictate to a certain extent where the approaches should be located. That is in the bill. It ought not to be taken out. If you take it out it destroys the bill, because we shall meet then with the combined opposition of the local authorities of the city of New York.

The bill was objected to heretofore for divers reasons. One of the reasons was that the local authorities of New York were against it. That has been obviated. It was objected that privileges were given in the bill which had been denied the other bridge company. What did the committee do? At its last meeting, at which the bill was agreed to be reported, the committee, in the interest of harmony and for the purpose of com-promise, put a provision in the bill whereby the same privilege, leaving it to the Secretary of War to determine to what extent the span should be over and above 2,000 feet, was given to the other company the same as to the New York and New Jersey

Bridge Company.

The Senator from Maine asks, is anybody objecting in behalf
The Senator from Maine asks, is anybody objecting in behalf of that bridge company? They have heretofore. I do not understand that they object now. Therefore, the two bridge companies, by the terms of the bill as reported unanimously by the committee, stand upon an equality. It is true that the charter of the Old North River Bridge Company provided for a single span. the Old North Kiver Bridge Company provided for a single spatial tis true now it is placed by the provisions of the bill precisely where the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company are placed, namely, that both spans must be at least 2,000 feet apart. They may be as much further apart as the Secretary of War, consultation with the engineers, thinks is advisable. So both bridge companies stand upon the same footing.

I care nothing about the other bridge company, nor in fact about this bridge company. If they intend to build their bridge all right. Their attitude to a certain extent has been one of opposition to this measure, and if they can build their bridge the citizens of New York will welcome them. There has been considerable delay. They were given an extension of time. It was not until a year ago that the bridge was to be started, that a commencement was to be had, I think last spring, and if it was done, if they got their money in Europe, there was to be but little opposition to this bill. Every time the bill comes forward it meets with some opposition I think upon the part of the other bridge company. I can not see now why there should be any opposition it it because both company. company. I can not see now why there should be any opposition to it, because both companies are placed upon an equality by the terms of the bill, and this is a concession it seems to me that no one should object to.

My friend from New Jersey may say that neither bridge com-pany should have this privilege of obstructing the river. I do not believe in that dog-in-the-manger policy. I believe the bill is sufficiently guarded. There may be something back of this, whereby certain people do not want a bridge across from New Jersey into New York. I want it constructed. I believe it is feasible under the provisions of the bill. I think the public interests demand it; I think the interests of the country demand it; and there must be some compromises in every bill. There were no dissenting votes to this report in the committee. All the interests were harmonized. Therefore I think that the amendment ought to be voted down, because in my judgment you will imperil the construction of the bridge by absolutely providing for a 3,100-foot span. You have no evidence before you of the cost of such a bridge. Has anyone made an estimate? Where is it? There has been no evidence taken upon it. It is not pre-sented here. In my judgment it substantially imperils the passage of the bill by making any such provision. It is sufficiently guarded when it is left to your chosen officers.

Mr. WHITE of California. Will the Senator from New York permit a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE of California. Has it been demonstrated or shown with any degree of certainty that a span of 3,100 feet can be so constructed as to be safe?

Mr. HILL. That is the question. Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator-

Mr. HILL. Allow me to say one word further. Bear in mind where this locality is. The bridge proper does not touch Jersey City at all. The approaches proper do not touch Jersey City

Mr. McPHERSON. I do not know what the Senator calls the approaches Approaches.

Mr. HILL. From above Sixty-sixth street it is substantially in the country so far as Jersey City is concerned.

Mr. McPHERSON. I know the plan which has been proposed here shows that a part of what they call their approaches runs for about 3 miles through Jersey City territory.

Mr. HILL. It may be the connections of other roads, but not the approaches to the bridge proper; they are nowhere near Jersey City; they are above.

Mr. McPHERSON. I only show the map furnished me by Mr. HILL. I am certain I am right on that question, and I am informed so by gentlemen here who know the exact locality.

Mr. PALMER. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. I ask him whether the municipal corporations are the power under the laws to pro-tions in New Jersey have not the power under the laws to protect themselves?

Mr. HILL. I was simply going to make one further sugges-tion. The portion above Sixty-sixth street on the Jersey side, where it is supposed that the bridge is to be located, has been set apart for anchorage ground for vessels. It is regarded as a safe place. This will not disturb them in the slightest. From the river up there it is, I think, at least 3 miles down to the Battery. It is a safe part of the river. There is no danger, and can not be any danger there.

I submit to the Senate that upon a great public work of this kind there ought to be something beyond this mere Maritime Association or some such association to object. The people of New York do not object. The merchants of New York do not Its great men there who control that city do not object. I think the objection the gentleman gives from one maritime association in New York should not cut much of a figure in the Senate.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President—
Mr. WHITE of Louisiana. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to ask a single question? The Senator from Missouri has stated substantially the answer to the question put by the Senator from California, but I desire to state it more specifically, and the answer to that question in the hearing before the com-and the answer to that question in the bill the nearing before the committee determined my action on the bill.

I put this question to Gen. Casey: "If a provision is inserted in the bill of 3,100 or 3,200 feet will it be possible to build the bridge?" Gen. Casey's answer was: "I am not a specialist in bridge building, nor would I qualify the army engineer as a specialist in bridge building, but I should say if that provision were put in the bill the bridge would not be engineeringly possible, and there would be no bridge. The longest span," said sible, and there would be no bridge. The longest span," said Gen. Casey, "of any bridge now existing is the Firth of Forth bridge, about 1,700 feet. The minimum span provided for this bridge is 2,000 feet. I think that is as high as it is safe to put the minimum stipulation in the bill." Then I said: "Gen. Casey," do I understand you to say that if we put in a limitation of 3,100 feet the bridge will not be built?" He said: "From my knowledge of engineering, although I do not claim to be a specialist in bridge building. I should say it can not be built." Therefore the question presented to me was, a bridge or no bridge; and inasmuch as the bill put a minimum limit above the widest span now existing on the face of the earth and then allowed the Secretary. now existing on the face of the earth, and then allowed the Secretary of War to stretch that limit as far as he thought the exigencies of commerce required compatible with the structure of the bridge, I thought, the commerce of the country requiring the bridge, it was my duty to vote to report the bill favorably, and I did so

Mr. MoPHERSON. I wish to say a single word, and then so far as I am concerned I shall be willing to vote upon this ques-I wish to call attention to the remarks made by the Sention. I wish to call attention to the remarks made by the Senator from New York. If he will consider for a single moment, they must appear to him as they do to me, as very weak, unnecessary, and almost discourteous. He charges me with being a friend of the other bridge bill, so called. I am the friend of the other bill and will be the friend of this bill in like manner if it spans the entire river. Then in the very next breath he tells us that his bill gives to my company, as he seems anxious to call it, the same privileges; conveying as I think the intimation that for that reason I would be found to favor it. He proposes that the existing company shall have the same privilege. Therefore I do not know how to apply his criticism to me when he says I was the friend of the other bill. He is more the friend of the other bill than I am, because he reduces the cost to them as well as to his own friends.

Now, Mr. President, I oppose piers in the river to either company. All are my friends, equally my friends, and I am willing to do as much for my friends as the Senator from New York, but I will not by any vote of mine destroy a great harbor, a water-way, in order that the cost of building a bridge may be reduced 50 per cent.

The Senator from Mississippi asks what it will cost to build his bridge. I will give him the cost as estimated by an engineer. this bridge. A six-track bridge spanning the river would cost about $20,000.

000. Remember this is to span the entire river.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, to the Committee on Commerce this question is as familiar as household words. It has been in this question is as familiar as household words. It has been in contention there for six years at least, and from the very beginning I have insisted that under no circumstances should a pier ever be placed in the river. The Senator from New York said that the committee were unanimous in support of the bill. He was correct in that statement with a limitation. I think I never gave the impression to the committee—I trust I did not, nor to him—that I yielded in my contention that there should be no pier in the river. I never have yielded that, and I could not in conscience do so. not in conscience do so.

When the North River Bridge Company was before our committee with a bill for incorporation, I favored it very enrestly, because it is immensely in the interest of the East as well as the West to have a bridge across that river. All of my constituents and all down through Maine and Massachusetts need the bridge immensely just as much as the West needs it. I became interested in it. It was a new proposition to bridge that river with a span of 2,000 feet. I made a careful examination myself, as a span of 2,000 feet. I made a careful examination myself, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and I came to the conclusion that the company ought not to be allowed for a single instant to put a pier in the river a thousand feet from the shore, the river being about 3,100 feet wide at Twenty-third street, where this bridge was proposed.

We submitted that bill again and again to the Secretary of War. It was submitted to the local engineers in New York, and the engineers in New York, and the convenient was increased that the transfer of the contract that the prior school he will be submitted.

in every instance it was insisted that no pier should be put into the river. Every return made from the War Department was that no pier should be put into the river. Every bill presented to the War Department for bridging that river was returned with a proposed amendment that no pier should be placed therein, and we concluded and voted unanimously on the North River bridge bill that there should be no pier. The plan of that bridge presented to the War Department shows that there is no pier, but that there are two towers at the end of the pier-head line on each side of the river and a suspension bridge 3,100 feet long running from tower to tower.

The North River Bridge Company is making no contest here whatever. I am making none for the North River Bridge Company; not the slightest. I am simply contending, as I have contended from the very beginning, that there should be no pier in that river, and that there should not be any discretion in the Section of the state of t retary of War or anybody else outside of Congress to put one there.
When this bridge bill same before the committee we sent it, as we send all such bills, to the Secretary of War.
Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; with pleasure. Mr. HILL. Was it not upon the Senator's motion that the North River Bridge Company was given the same power to construct a bridge with a span of 2,000 feet if the Secretary of War so approved?

Mr. FRYE. Mr. HILL. Mr. HILL. Did not the Senator vote to report the bill?
Mr. FRYE. I knew perfectly well that the pending bill reported to the United States Senate, backed as it was by a large majority of the Committee on Commerce and by two Senators from the great State of New York, would pass this body and eventually become a law. I believed it was outrageously unjust on a bridge company that had already spent $250,000, had made contracts for steel. had purchased 114 lots of land on the made contracts for steel. had purchased 114 for of land on the Jersey side for its bridge, and was straining every energy to build a bridge which would cost $50,000,000, with a span imposed upon that bridge of 2,100 feet, for Congress to parallel that bridge company right in its agony now, in these financial times, with another bridge with the liberty of a span of 2,000 feet.

No man would object to a proposition to place the two bridges upon a parallel important times, with the other but I did not yield my upon a parallelism one with the other, but I did not yield my contention that neither bridge should be permitted to have a pier in that river. I say when this very bridge bill came to us several years ago it was sent as usual to the War Department. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] can not say anything complimentary to Gen. Casey that I will not indorse with all my heart. He is one of the noblest and most honest men I ever knew in my life, and I would trust him with honor, property, or anything else on earth. What did Gen. Casey say of this bridge bill?

Commencing with the word "no," in line 39, strike out all down to and including the word "war," in line 43—

It would not be the same line here.
Mr. HILL. What is the date of that letter?
Mr. FRYE. April 29, 1892—and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The said bridge shall be constructed with a single span over the entire river between the towers or piers located between the shore and the established pler-head lines in either State, and no pier or other obstruction to navigation, of a temporary or permanent character, shall be constructed in the river between said towers or piers."

The very amendment which the Senator from New Jersey has offered here. That was Gen. Casey's judgment in relation to it in 1892. February 23, 1893, the same bill was again referred to Gen. Casey, and he says:

After the word "feet," in line 43, insert "and the necessary towers or piers shall be located and built between the shore and the established pier-head lines in either State."

He never has made any return differently from that.

Mr. VEST. Is he of that opinion now?

Mr. FRYE. I will come to that in a moment. I say he never has made any return differently from that. The last return under which this bridge bill is reported to the Senate never came through the hands of the Chief of Engineers. The Chief of Engineers with a sick wife had been shear for two works. Engineers, with a sick wife, had been absent for two months from this city. The local engineers in New York reported directly through the Engineer Department to the Secretary of War in favor of this bridge. If that matter had gone to Gen. Casey, I have not the shadow of a doubt but that he would have proposed the same amendment he has proposed to this bridge bill every time the hill has been sent to him for explanation and I have not same amendment he has proposed to this bridge bill every time the bill has been sent to him for explanation, and I have not a shadow of a doubt as to the effect of the location of a pier on that river. You will be compelled for a 2,000-foot suspension bridge to make a pier at least 300 feet square. The Forth pier is 400 and odd feet by 260, with a span of 1,200 feet. Now, drop into that river, if you please, a pier 300 feet square, in a river where the tide ebbs and flows, and where every ebb and flow will land against that pier on the upper side and the lower side an immense amount of débris, and thus in three or four years it will build up there an island, and in less than ten years you will have an island at least 4 acres in extent right in this river, in fog and in sunlight. I submit to any Senator whether that would be an in sunlight. I submit to any Senator whether that would be an obstruction to navigation of which mariners might not with infinite reason complain?

But can you build a span? Senators say they do not know. Gen. Casey, when asked the question, said that the Army engineers were necessarily not familiar with the matter of bridge building, but he said he would refer the committee to Engineer Lindenthal, the engineer of the North River Bridge Company, as able an engineer as there is in the United States. He is the engineer who made the span for the North River Bridge Company and submitted it to the Secretary of War, and it has received his approval. He says that there is not a shadow of a difficulty in building a span 3,100 feet long, and he says it costs of course a great deal more in proportion than one 2,000 feet long. Anybody can see that.

When the Brooklyn Bridge was proposed with a single span of 1,600 feet there was not an engineer in the United States who did not express serious doubt as to whether a bridge with that amount of span could be built, and there was a long contention as to whether the pier should be thrust out into the river any further than the pier-head line on the ground that you could not build it. They went to work; they built it; there was no difficulty about it then, and you can duplicate that Brooklyn Bridge to-day for one-half what it actually cost when it was built. Such attripments have been reade in scientific efforts in built. Such attainments have been made in scientific efforts in the matter of engineering and of bridge building especially, and you can now build a span of 3,100 feet in length just as easily as ten years ago you could have built one 1,000 feet in length. As a matter of course, I say it will cost more money. I understand Mr. Lindenthal to say—

Mr. HILL. What does the engineer estimate that a 3,100-foot span will cost?

Mr. FRYE. I can not tell the cost of the span; it is a high estimate. I think the whole cost of the bridge and approaches is in the neighborhood of $50,000,000 or $60,000,000. That is the

Mr. McPHERSON. If the Senator will bear with me, I have Mr. Lindenthal's estimate, who was the engineer of the North River bridge, as to the cost of a six-track bridge, which we understand this company proposes to build from their plan. I read from Mr. Lindenthal's statement:

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will wait just one moment I will finish what I have to say and yield the floor.

Mr. McPHERSON. All right.
Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Missouri says, can you not trust
Gen. Casey. I can and if I knew that Gen. Casey would be Chief Engineer for the next ten years I would not have the slightest hesitation in trusting him in connection with this bridge. He told me that he would never consent, so long as he lived, to a span of less than 2,700 feet at this place; that under no circumspan of less than 2, 100 feet at this place; that under no circumstances would he consent to it; and his own proposed amendment indicates his opinion. Therefore I would trust him entirely. I believe if the plans were laid before Gen. Casey to-day for approval he would compel the North River Bridge Company, as he did before, to build a span of 3,100 feet, and he would compel this bridge company, too, to build a span of 3,100 feet. But I have no assurance that Gen. Casey will always be there. I should have confidence in almost any army engineer. I have confidence in Mr. Lamont, the Secretary of War, but I do not know who Mr. Lamont's successor may be. I might have confidence in him. I hold it to be the duty of Congress, not of the Secretary of War, to say whether a pier shall be put into the

Mr. President, I am not in the attitude of opposing this bill. I very likely should not have offered this amendment to the bill.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me to say that the plans under this bill must be submitted to the Secretary of War within a year, and the work begun within a year, so that Gen. Casey and the present Secretary of War will have to deal with it.

Mr. FRYE. I understand that to be true, and there is not so much danger in the bill, I am free to admit, as I can conceive there might have been put in a bill; but I have my views about that river. The Senator from New York may think that I do not know anything about the river which flows up and down in front of his own city, and that he ought to know a great deal more about it than I, and feel a great deal more interest in it. I simply desire to say to the Senator from New York that I have made a pretty thorough and a pretty complete investigation of that river over and over again since I have been chairman of the Committee on Commerce, and I am reasonably familiar with the river and its navigation interests. I confess, however, that I have always felt more interest (and I think the Committee on Commerce will bear me out in that) in the maritime concerns than I have in the transportation over the rivers. My natural bent and turn have been for the protection of navigation rather than for the protection of railroads, while I believe and know that one is entitled to as much consideration as the other. I shall be compelled to vote for this amendment, but on my conscience, if it is not adopted, I still will vote for the bill as reported from the committee

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, I should like to answer the question asked by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL.] from a report made by Mr. Lindenthal, the engineer of the North River Bridge Company, who has been in Europe trying to make contracts for the construction of his bridge, and therefore I as-sume he knows quite as much about the probable cost of both bridges as any man living:

I am informed that the parties who built the Firth of Forth bridge agreed build a bridge of a single span across the Hudson River, and to guarantee for a certain sum of money, and if this be true they did not deem it imracticable.

If that company, meaning the company here asking for this legislation, would invite competitive plans from engineers and bridge builders for a 3,100-foot span, which is nearly the same at that location as for the North River bridge at Hoboken, it would soon be shown that a single-span bridge for fast railroad trains on six tracks may be readily and economically built on that location for about $20,000,000.

Mr. HILL. I desire to state to the Senator, he has no connection of course whatever with either bridge company, although he holds in his hand the communication of its chief engineer. he holds in his hand the communication of its chief engineer. I have none; but the record before the committee shows that the engineers of the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company say it would cost from $60,000.000 to $70,000,000 to build this bridge. Bear in mind it is not to be done by the cities of New York and Jersey City, but it is to be done by private capital, and it could not be obtained. That is all I have to say in regard to that. We do not agree in the figures; and I do not believe that we can find any engineers in the country who will say that that bridge can be built for $20,000,000.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. CILLLOM addressed the Chair

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. CULLOM addressed the Chair.
Mr. CULLOM. I will yield to the Senator from Mississippi.
Mr. MILLS. If this debate is to continue, the bill evidently can not be disposed of to-day, and I hope we shall have an executive session.

Mr. CULLOM. If a vote can be taken I will withhold any remarks I desire to make.

Mr. McPherson. Let us vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson].

Mr. McPHERSON. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays. Mr. MANDERSON. Let the amendment be read. The SECRETARY. In section 3 strike out all after the word

"made," in line 53, and insert:

And the said bridge shall be constructed with a single span over the entire river between towers or piers located between the shore and the existing pier-head lines in either State, and no pier or other obstruction to navigation of a temporary or permanent character shall be constructed in the river between said towers or piers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, on which the yeas and navs have been demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be again read

Mr. VEST. If my colleague will permit me, I should like to state exactly the question. As the bill comes from the committee it provides that there shall be a span of not less than 2,000 feet, but that the Secretary of War may require a longer span,

Mr. CULLOM. And all to be done within twelve months.

Now, that is the question. If the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey prevails it does away with the discretion of the Secretary of War entirely and says that there shall be one span across the river without regard to its length.

Mr. CULLOM. And all to be done within twelve months. Now, that is the question. If the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey prevails it does away with the discretion of the Secretary of War entirely and says that there shall be one span across the river without regard to its length.

Mr. COCKRELL. And the bill as passed by the other House requires the span to be 2,000 feet.

Mr. VEST. Not less than 2,000 feet, and it provides that the Secretary of War may require a longer span if he thinks neces-

Mr. MANDERSON. Can the Senator from Missouri give us the width of the river at that point between the piers?

Mr. VEST. About 3,100 feet, or 3,200 possibly.
Mr. FRYE. The width at Twenty-third street is about 3,100 feet; at Sixty-sixth street it is about 3,100 feet, 1 mile above it is about 3,300 feet, and 1 mile above that it is about 3,250 feet, measured by scales

Mr. DOLPH. I think the Senator has made a mistake in saying that it is 3,300 feet 1 mile above Sixty-sixth street. It is

3,200 feet 1 mile above, and 3,300 feet 2 miles above. Mr. SQUIRE. How much of the river is shoal, not navigable at the place where the bridge is proposed to be built?

Mr. McPHERSON. None of it.

Mr. VEST. There is deep water on the Jersey side, I think.

Mr. SQUIRE. How much of it is not navigable? I have been told that a large area of the river there is unsuitable for navigation.

Mr. VEST. I believe there is some of it not navigable, but I do not know exactly how much. As the bill comes from the committee it leaves the discretion to the Secretary of War to approve the plans provided no span shall be put in of less than 2,000 feet. The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey does away with the discretion of the Secretary of War, and requires one span, without regard to length.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, line 68, before the word "pay" strike out the word "greater;" so as to read:

Fifth. The company or companies availing themselves of the privileges of this act shall not charge a higher rate of toll than authorized by the laws of the States of New York and New Jersey, and shall receive no pay for the transportation of the mails across said bridge than is allowed per mile to railroads using the same.

Mr. VEST. As I understand the meaning of this amendment. it is to take away from this company pay for carrying the mails of the United States across this bridge. It has not been customary to have such a provision in regard to bridge companies. Wherever a railroad has a contract to carry the mails a certain distance, and that railroad company enters into a contract with a bridge company, of course the bridge company receives no pay, because the United States Government then treats with railroad company; but in case no such contract should exist with the railroad company; but in case no such contract should exist with the railroad company, and the United States should want to contract with the bridge company to carry the mails from one side of the river to the other, as the bill stands, the company could only charge the same rate that is charged for the transportation of the mails by the railroads on either side of the river. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, in any event, deprives the bridge company of any pay for carrying the rails.

mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri a question, as he is familiar with this subject. I ask if I am right in supposing that where the carrying of the mail across the bridge was the principal carriage it would have, whether the mail might not be compelled to go around in some other way, and thus delay and inconvenience the public? The bridge company would have no motive to let them cross the bridge

Mr. VEST. That might be.
Mr. FRYE. I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri
[Mr. VEST]—and perhaps the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. AL-LEN] may have taken his amendment from that suggestion—that in the case of the North River Bridge Company we did insert a provision that the mails should be carried free across the bridge. The reason we did that was because we conferred unusual powers on the North River Bridge Company. We had chartered the corporation, thus giving it reputation and credit which otherwise it would not have had, and we had given it the right of condemnation of property, a right which it has exercised, and in consideration of those unusual rights and privileges, we required that company to adopt the proposition practically which the Senator from Nebraska offers; but my recollection is that it never has been done in any other case. I ask the Senator from Missouri if that is not correct?

Mr. VEST. It never has been done in any other case.

Mr. FRYE. And I do not think it ought to be done in this

Mr. HOAR. That is not, as I understand it, the effect of this proposition. This is not a proposition that the mails shall be carried free across the oridge or to compel the company to carry them, but it is a provision that the company shall receive no pay.

Mr. VEST. That is it.

Mr. FRYE. That is still worse.

Mr. ALLEN. I was going to suggest, if the Senator from Maine will allow me a moment, that possibly this whole difficulty can be obviated. I understand the mail is carried across these bridges by contract with the vailroad companies? bridges by contract with the railroad companies?

bridges by contract with the railroad companies?

Mr. VEST. In some cases; yes.

Mr. ALLEN. If that be true, it occurs to me that the bridge company ought not to charge the Government distinctly for carrying the mail or for the privilege of the mail passing over that bridge, at least that it would be just as proper to make a distinct charge against passengers and against freight carried over the bridge as it would be to make a distinct charge against the Government for carrying the mail, providing the company which carries the mail pays for the privilege of using the bridge.

Mr. FRYE. I can not conceive how that could be done, because a contract would be made for carrying the mails from Washington to New York, and, as a matter of course, if this bridge were built the mail would be carried across it.

Mr. ALLEN. Senators seem to think that this difficulty can be obviated, but there is more trouble with the language empty.

be obviated, but there is more trouble with the language employed than there is with the fact. I withdraw, however, that portion of the amendment, but the other portions of the amendment I think I shall insist upon.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator please indicate the others?

Mr. ALLEN. I shall ask a vote on the amendment I have offered to the sixth clause, which reads:

Sixth. That said company or companies shall be subject to the interstate-commerce law and to all amendments thereof, and when such bridge is con-structed under the provisions of this act it shall be a lawful military and post-road and a lawful structure.

I move to amend that clause by striking out, in line 72, after the word "all," the words "amendments thereof;" and inserting "laws enacted or to be enacted by Congress; "and after the word "structure," in line 75, to insert "and may be used for necessary military and post-road purposes without compensation."

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The laws hereafter to be enacted of course could be made applicable in any direction Congress pleases to this be made applicable in any direction Congress pleases to this bridge, because the right is reserved to amend or alter the act.

and it can be changed in any way Congress pleases.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator is partially correct, but my idea is that the expression in this clause, "subject to the interstate-commerce law," is not sufficiently broad, and that it should be expressed more distinctly that this corporation is subject to all laws now in existence or which may hereafter be enacted by Congress, so as to put the question of Congressional control entirely beyond any question. Possibly the language I have proposed does no more than to enlarge and make more specific a power which was designed to be granted.

Then, the next amendment, it occurs to me, ought to be adopted. That is, if this company is granted the privilege of constructing a bridge and they are charging tolls and making money out of it, the Government ought to have the right to use that bridge for necessary military and postal purposes without any charge, believe that to be just.

I have no desire to enter into any lengthy discussion on the subject, but the amendments I have proposed appeal to my sense of justice as being correct.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In clause 6, line 72, after the world "all," it is proposed to strike out "amendments thereof" and insert laws enacted or to be enacted by Congress.

The amendment was rejected.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.
The SECRETARY. In clause 6, line 75, after the word "structure," it is proposed to insert: And may be used for necessary military and post-road purposes without compensation.

The amendment was rejected. Mr. TURPIE. I submit that the first word "and," in line 68, should be "or."

Mr. MILLS. That is right. It should read "New York or New Jersey

Mr. VEST. That is correct.
Mr. HILL. There is no objection to that amendment.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Texas to yield to me.

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senate goes into executive session on the motion of the Senator from Texas, I wish the Senate to take up for consideration, and it may then be laid over until to-morrow, Calendar No. 80, being House bill 3687.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The title of the bill will be stated. The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware to take up the hill the title of which the Senator from Delaware to take up the bill the title of which has been read.

Mr. MILLS. Let that bill go over.

Mr. GRAY. I merely wish to have the bill taken up for consideration, and then I shall yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. DAVIS. I call for a division on the question of taking up the bill.

Mr. VEST. I think we had better have the yeas and mays. Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that his motion, if a majority of the Senate wish to take up the bill, will be as potent to-morrow morning after the routine business is over as now. The Senator is aware of the danger which exists, that if a division be had it may result in showing the want of a quorum.

Mr. GRAY. I have the bill in charge and I should like very much to have it taken up to-night, and then I should yield for a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator had better not press the motion.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senators insist on calling for a division, of course I am helpless.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MILLS. I insist on my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, which has precedence over the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I withdraw my motion.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, November 1, 1893, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, October 31, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. ISAAC W. CANTER, of Washington, D.C.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved. GOVERNMENT NAVAL EXHIBIT, CHICAGO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the Senate joint resolution 36, transferring the exhibit of the Navy Department, known as the model battle ship Illinois to the State of Illinois as a naval armory for the use of the naval militia of the State of Illinois, on the termination of the World's Columbian Exposition.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this resolution. The committee has reported it favorably as a substitute for a pending House bill.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The resolution is as follows:

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, etc., That on the termination of the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago, Ill., in November, 1808, the exhibit of the Navy Department of the United States Government, better known as the model battle ship Illinois, a facsimile of the sattle-ships Indiana, Massachusetts, and Oregon, with such of her boats, equipments, and appurtenances now on exhibition as the Secretary of the Navy shall deem proper, be transferred to the State of Illinois as a naval armory for the use of the naval militia of the State of Illinois: Provided, That such articles as may or have been loaned by the Various bureaus of the Navy Department, the United States Marine Corps, the Naval Academy, and Hydrographic Office be not included in the said transfer, except as hereinbefore provided.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from New York will give his attention, I would like to ask how much this resolution covers? Does it cover the rifle cannon as well as the model of the vessel? Mr. CUMMINGS. It covers just what the Secretary of the Navy shall decide. It leaves it with him. Here is a proviso which says:

That such articles as may be or have been loaned by the various burear of the Executive Department, the United States Marine Corps, the Nav Academy, and Hydrographic Office be not included in the said transfer ecept as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. REED. It is not contemplated that it shall cover the ordnance or anything of that sort?
Mr. CUMMINGS. No, sir.
Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Only the structure itself.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CUMMINGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

BRIDGE OVER CADDO LAKE.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the House Calendar from the bill (H. R. 1919) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Caddo Lake at or near Mooringsport, La., and Cross Bayou, near Shreveport, La., and put it upon its passage.
The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

In line 36, section 1, after the word "sunrise" insert the words "throughout the season of navigation."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BLANCHARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS SULPHUR RIVER, ARKANSAS.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill (H. R. 1917) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas

This bill is to allow the same railroad company to cross another river. It is identical, I believe, in terms with the other except as to the rivers or the bridge.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. McRAE. The bill is identical with the other bill that has just been acted upon by the House. It has been referred to the War Department. It is the same railroad company, and I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill and consider the amendments suggested by the committee.

Mr. TRACEY. I object, Mr. Speaker. I think all of these bills should be read.

bills should be read.

The bill was read at length.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendments:

In line 6 of section 1, after the word "Arkansas," insert the words "or in the State of Texas."

In line 8 of section 1, after the word "line," insert the words "said point selected to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War."

In line 42 of section 1, after the word "and," insert the words "whatever kind of bridge shall be constructed."

In line 43 of section 1, after the word "sunrise," insert the words "through out the season of navigation."

Amend the title by inserting, after the word "Arkansas," the words "of in the State of Texas."

There being no objection the bill was considered, and the amendments recommended by the committee were concurred in

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The committees were called for reports; when bills of the following titles were severally presented, and, with the accompanying reports, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Calendars named below:

TEXARKANA AND FORT SMITH RAILWAY COMPANY, ARKANSAS.

By Mr. GEARY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce: A bill (H. R. 1916) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Little River, in the State of Arkansas—to the House Calendar.

FORFEITURE OF RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

By Mr. ELLIS of Oregon, from the Committee on the Public Lands: A bill (H. R. 3544) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes"-to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

ADMISSION OF NEW MEXICO AS A STATE.

By Mr. JOSEPH, from the Committee on Territories: A bill (H. R. 353) to enable the people of New Mexico to form a consti-stution and State government and to be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States-to the House Calendar.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE RECESS.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to sit during the recess.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The SPEAKER.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Appropriations, or such subcommittees as they may designate, are hereby authorized to sit during the vacation, for the purpose of considering and facilitating the business of the committee in advance of the next regular session, to be convened at such time as the chairman of said committee may order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

I did not understand what committee it is.

The Committee on Appropriations. Mr. BROSIUS.

Mr. BROSIUS. I the later that the specific states on Appropriations.
Mr. SAYERS. The resolution is in the usual form.
Mr. KILGORE. The only objection to it is that it assumes there is going to be a vacation. If we decide to take a vacation it will be time enough to make such an order as this then.
Mr. SAYERS. O, I hope the gentleman will let the resolution go through.

Mr. KILGORE. Some of us have not consented to a vacation

Mr. SAYERS. Well, if there is no vacation, then the resolu-

Mr. SAYERS. Well, it there is no vacation, then the resolution will not amount to anything.
Mr. McMILLIN. What is the resolution?
Mr. SAYERS. Simply that the Appropriations Committee may be authorized to sit during the vacation, if there is one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Cox, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes;" in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at half past 12. The Committee on the Judiciary have a bill before the House, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3299) to amend the naturalization laws of the United States. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is an hour remain-

The SPEAKER. The gentleman consumed thirty minutes of his time yesterday.

Mr. OATES. I mean there is an hour to-day for the consideration of this bill

The SPEAKER. There is an hour for the consideration of the bill, but the gentleman's own time will expire in thirty minutes, when some other gentleman will be recognized.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, in continuation of the remarks I began yesterday upon this bill to amend the naturalization laws, I wish to say that the bill is not harsh in any of its provisions, and is not intended to be. I would willingly amend the bill in the seventh line of the first section so as to make the meaning perfectly consistent with my statement of yesterday; that is, as a qualification for naturalization, that a man shall be able to read the Constitution of the United States, by adding the words "in any language," so that its meaning will be unmistakable.

Also, in accordance with a suggestion made by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], I am willing to strike out of line 4 in section 5, the words, "being the next highest courts of record to the supreme courts of said States," because the language, "courts of the highest original common law jurisdiction," would cover the same, and the striking out of the words I have indicated would prevent any confusion whatever. I desire to amend the bill not only by the addition of the section of which I spoke on yesterday, to require certification from these decrees and judgments of naturalization to the State Department for record, but an additional clause that nothing in this bill should be construed as in any wise affecting the property rights of aliens in any of the States where they reside.

Now, sir, it will be observed by gentlemen who have examined the question that our laws touching the status of the rights of aliens in this country, not only to naturalization but their rights of property, are in a very confused condition. They are in need of revision so as to clearly put upon our statute books all those rights consistent, on the one hand, with the powers of the Government and the duties of the Government to see to it that their rights are preserved on the one hand, that no impositions are made upon it and no fraudulent citizens are made. In order that I may present more clearly these rights I desire the indulgence of the House to present the following views:

As to the constitutional power of Congress to pass a law denying to aliens the right to become naturalized or to acquire and own a fee-simple title to lands within the States of the Union I have no doubt; but many good lawyers either doubt the exist-ence of such a power or believe emphatically that Congress has no such power. Let us examine the question as to the rights of aliens and of our governments, State and Federal, over them. By the common law an alien can take the title to real estate by purchase, which includes a conveyance by devise, but can not take by inheritance because he has no inheritable blood. He can take the title as a purchaser, but the estate is subject to be denounced and forfeited by the sovereign power. The estate vests in the alien not for his own benefit, but for the benefit of the State or sovereignty

'In the language of the ancient law, the alien has the capacity to take, but not to hold lands; and they may be seized into the hands of the sovereign. But until the lands are so seized the alien has complete dominion over them and may convey the same to a purchaser." (See the case of Fairfax vs. Hunter, 7 Cranch, 619.)

An alien can not take or transmit land by descent. (Levy vs. McCartee, 6 Peters, 102.)

An alien who acquires land by purchase can hold and occupy it until office found in a direct proceeding in the name of the State or sovereignty, but if the alien becomes naturalized before office found his title to the land becomes perfect. (Gouverneur's Heirs vs. Robertson, 11 Wheat., 332.)

Office-found is the technical term used to describe the finding of the fact of alienage by a public officer having authority to adjudge upon an inquest held at the instance of the Government.

(See Phillips vs. Moore, 100 U. S., 208-212.)
The following-named States of the Union allow aliens to acquire, hold, and transmit lands within their respective borders without restrictions or limitation, placing them in this respect substantially on the same basis as citizens: Alabama, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Carolina, South Carolina, West Virginia (New York) ginia, and Wisconsin.

While the following States by their laws make the permanent holding of lands by aliens dependent upon residence or upon a declaration of intention to become naturalized, and in the absence of these qualifications generally prescribe some time within which the alien may dispose of the lands: Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Delaware, Indiana, Kentucky, Maryland, New York, Tennessee, and Virginia. In Texas, since 1879, the conditions upon which aliens can hold are reciprocity or declaration of intended citizenship. In Georgia, since 1873, the limitation is to 160 acres and improvements made thereon. In Pennsylvania alien absentee proprietorship is allowed to the extent of 5,000 acres to each holder, and in the District of Columbia, prior to the act of the Forty-ninth Congress, an alien could acquire, hold, convey, and devise real estate the same as though he were a citizen; but by that act he was disabled to do so. Under the laws of the United States aliens are entitled to purchase from the Government the public lands at public sale or cash entry at $1.25 per acre, but can not acquire them under the preemption or homestead laws without a declaration of inten-tion to become naturalized. The bill under consideration withholds the patent of a homesteader until he is naturalized.

This is the state of the law to-day within the States of the Union, but within the Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia no alien can acquire or own any lands since the passage of the act of the Forty-ninth Congress on the subject, approved March 3, 1887

I have stated the law to be that an alien holds his title to lands subject to forfeiture by the sovereign power.

The next question which arises is, Where does that sovereign power reside in our dual and complex system of governments? maintain (and it looks like a concession which gives away my position) that the State in which the land lies is the sovereign power, and it must therefore be the State which has the right to denounce and forfeit an alien holding. In the State resides the right of eminent domain. Each State for itself has the right to regulate the course of descent and the mode and manner of conveyance of land within its borders. (Ethridge vs. Mannerse, 18 Ala., 585. See also the Dredd Scott case, 19 How.)

ner of conveyance of land within its borders. (Ethridge vs. Malempree, 18 Ala., 565. See also the Dredd Scott case, 19 How.)
I think that this is the basis upon which is founded the objection for want of constitutional power in Congress to pass a law prohibiting aliens from owning lands within the States of the Union which has been urged. But such a law would not deprive any State of any right which it reserved from the Union for itself and its people. Before the adoption of the Constitution each State had the right to pass naturalization laws—to invest aliens with all the rights possessed by natives upon any terms which the State saw proper to prescribe—but by its adoption and ratification every State surrendered that right. That Constitution declares that Congress shall have power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization * * * throughout the United States."

Kent, Story, and other distinguished commentators upon the Constitution all hold that this grant vests in Congress the exclusive right to legislate upon the subject of naturalization. The only restriction is that the laws upon that subject must be "uniform throughout the United States;" that is, the law must be the same as applied to all aliens from whatever country they come. And here was one of the doubts which arose in the case with reference to the Chinese.

In Collet vs. Collet, 2 Dallas, the Supreme Court of the United States held that in the absence of any law of Congress upon the subject a State might pass naturalization laws, provided they were not in conflict with any law of Congress upon the subject, but afterwards in numerous well-considered cases that court held that the power of naturalization was vested exclusively in Congress. That being true, the legal status of an alien, that is, all the rights which he acquires or can exercise in this country beyond those with which the common law and law of nations invest him is acquired by his naturalization—his becoming a citizen.

In Vattel's Law of Nations, Book 2, chapter 8, section 114, it is pointedly asserted to be the right of every sovereignty to deny to aliens the right to own or possess lands or immovable property within its jurisdiction.

It must be conceded, in fact it is too well settled to admit of a doubt, that the United States have the right and power to prevent any subject of Great Britain or any other foreign nation from landing upon our shores. The United States have the right to exclude the people whether citizens or subjects of any other country from coming to this for any purpose.

other country from coming to this for any purpose.

See Phillimore's International Law, volume 1, page 260, and the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Chinese case.

Mr. Marcy, Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Fay, our minister to Switzerland in 1856:

Every society possesses the undoubted right to determine who shall compose its members, and it is exercised by all nations both in peace and war. A memorable example of the exercise of this power in time of peace was the passage of the allen law of the United States in the year 1798. * * There can be no doubt that it is possessed by all nations, and that each may decide for itself when the occasion arises demanding its exercise.

Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Foster, minister to Mexico in 1873, that—

The power of expelling obnoxious foreigners is one incident to sovereignty.

Whatever rights may be conferred upon them is dependent upon the liberty to exercise this power.

Secretary Frelinghuysen wrote to Mr. Stillman in 1882 that— This Government can not contest the right of foreign governments to exclude, on policy or other grounds, American citizens from their shores.

Many other citations might be made, but I deem it unnecessary. The right of total exclusion has recently been asserted and exercised by the Congress of the United States in the acts excluding the Chinese from this country. Congress has the same right to exclude the subjects of any other nation. I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not now on the question of expediency, but am discussing the question of power, and I think I have shown it to exist beyond question.

I am in favor and always have been in favor of laws regulating immigration in this country which will not admit of the 500,000 or 600,000 immigrants landing upon our shores every year. I am not for so restricting those laws as to exclude from among us those who will become worthy and useful citizens, and there are many such who come to this country from abroad. Many of the best citizens we have are foreigners. We even have members upon this floor, Mr. Speaker, intelligent ones, too, who were born

But I want to say in that connection that it is a mistaken policy for us, because some of our citizens are of foreign birth, that we must not legislate so as to have proper laws against fraud being perpetrated, and all men being admitted to citizenship who were born abroad. That is a mistaken policy; and aliens of intelligence, when the question is properly put to them, will join in

Now, if the United States can totally exclude from their jurisdiction the citizens or subjects of other nations, why can not the United States say when they admit such subjects what rights they may have and exercise within the jurisdiction of the United States? Does not the greater include the less? Who can deny the force of this logic? It follows that Congress has the right to prescribe the terms upon which such alien subjects may become citizens of this country. It proves that Congress is invested with the power to deny to such persons the right to acquire or own lands anywhere within the United States during the existence of their alien condition, or to impose whatever requirements for naturalization deemed to be proper.

Such a law if passed by Congress operates only upon the person that the contract of the contract

Such a law if passed by Congress operates only upon the person of the alien, and his incidental disability to own lands within a State can not with any propriety be said to infringe any reserved right of such State or any citizen thereof.

Two great questions for the solution of Congress are begin-

Two great questions for the solution of Congress are beginning to agitate the public mind, and the sooner it undertakes in good earnest the legislation they demand the better it will be for the country.

The first is that of unlimited immigration of foreigners into the United States; the other is that of alien ownership of lunds, I assume, and think I will be able to prove before I conclude my remarks, that both of these are absolute evils.

remarks, that both of these are absolute evils.

And while the laws should not exclude proper persons, they ought to be of a character which shall require the courts and the district attorneys to do their duty, so that no imposition will be made, and that those who are not entitled to citizenship, who are not honorable men, will be excluded from that great benefaction.

As shown by statistics our immigration laws, as well as that of naturalization and others touching the status of foreigners, ought to be revised, strengthened, and made to operate more for the protection of the people of our governments, State and Federal.

I submit the following, compiled by my friend, Mr. Stone, and which I believe is accurate:

There are by the Eleventh Census 43,127 penitentiary convicts whose birthplace and parentage are known. Of this number 14,725 are foreigners, born in foreign countries, 14,687 are colored, and 13,715 are native born. The total number of penitentiary convicts of foreign and native birth, excluding colored persons, is 28,440, of which number 13,715 are native born and 14,75 are of foreign birth, that is, themselves born in foreign countries. And thus we see that while the percentage of foreigners in the country is only 15 per cent, more than half of those inside the penitentiary, excluding colored peple, are foreigners.

These figures do not prove that immigration to this country is undesirable, but they do prove that a great many immigrants have been coming here in the last few years who are undesirable. There are 23,566 inmates of benevient institutions born in this country whose parents are both native born and there are 17,120 who are of foreign birth. Counting those born in this country of one or both foreign parents as native born, the percentage of those of foreign birth in our benevolent institutions to those foreign borns about 25 per cent.

In our almshouses or poorhouses the percentage of foreign born is far greater. By the census of 1890 there are 73,045 persons in our poorhouses, of whom 6,467 are negroes, Chinese, and Indians. There are 27,648 foreigners, or about 35 per cent, while there are only 21,519 whose parents are native born. Counting all born in this country as native born whether of native or foreign parents, and excluding the negroes, Chinese, and Indians, 41 per cent of all the persons in the poorhouses of the United States were born in foreign countries and came to this country as immigrants.

The alien who purchases a small farm and settles upon it to cultivate the soil and raise stock is not of the objectionable or dangerous class. He intends to be naturalized and to become a citizen and to assimilate with our people. He may be and usually is a stranger to American institutions and methods; but this of itself constitutes no great objection, especially when they come, not in colonies, but singly or accompanied by but a few others. The only possible objection to him when he thus comes is that we do not need him. It is contended by some that he is needed to fill up and develop the vast prairies and waste places of the Western States and Territories. This I deny.

These vacant spaces in the Westwill soon be required for occupancy by the surplus populations of the older States of the Union. The natural increase of sixty millions of people will within the next century of our national existence require all the available space within the present boundaries of the United States for their comfortable and easy maintenance without overcrowding. If the people of these United States have the wisdom to be content with their present geographical extent, as it seems to me that with their present geographical extent, as it seems to me that sound conservatism and good judgment dictate, the time has arrived to reverse the policy of the past century of our career, arrived to reverse the policy of the past century of our career, and cease our efforts to induce foreigners to immigrate to our shores to divide with us and our children the good things and great blessings which we have inherited from our ancestors.

But if, upon the other hand, we wish to devote ourselves, our energies and means, to the pioneer and missionary work of providing homes for the oppressed and unfortunate of every other land and country, we should now begin to take the preliminary steps and to prepare the way for the further acquisition of territory, and persevere to the final absorption of all the neighboring States of this continent.

In this I apprehend danger, from its vastness and lack of homogeneity, of ultimate dissolution.

To the young and ambitious, especially to the martial spirit of mogeneity, of ultimate dissolution.

To the young and ambitious, especially to the martial spirit of America, such an extension of the Government of the United States presents an inviting and fascinating prospect; and although it may carry with it a promise of great beneficence to suffering humanity, the people of sober judgment and sound philosophy will hesitate long and thoughtfully before they will ever incur the risk to the perpetuity of the Union and the liberty preserved by our written Constitution which such vastness of acquisitions would involve.

of acquisitions would involve. Now, Mr. Speaker, I might consume much more time, but Now, Mr. Speaker, I might consume much more time, but I have already spoken longer than I intended when I began, and I will ask to have printed with my remarks, in this connection, the report which accompanies this bill. I have learned that there is opposition on this floor to this bill, and some gentlemen desire to be heard; and I am one of those who never desire to take snap judgment or have any measure passed without ample opportunity of discussion and fair understanding. Therefore, as the time remaining is so short that it is impossible to do that and reach a vote upon this bill, as much as I am attached to this and reach a vote upon this bill, as much as I am attached to this bill, and desire it to be passed, I will not insist in consuming the time in a vote, but will allow gentlemen ample opportunity to discuss it in the remainder of the hour.

Mr. OATES. I was going to say, if I were allowed to make the suggestion, that I give my five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, who is opposed to the bill.

Mr. OATES. I gave away my five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois; and I wish further to suggest that the gentleman from Texas also desires to oppose the bill.

The SPEAKER. What was the request of the gentleman from Alabama as to publication in the RECORD?

Mr. OATES. Merely that I may print the committee's report in the RECORD as a continuation of my remarks.

There was no objection. The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3299) entitled "A bill to amend the naturalization laws of the United States," report the same back to the House with the following amendments, and thus amended your committee recommends the passage of the bill.

bill.

Amend section 2 by inserting in line 11, after the words "has since resided at ," the following, "and nowresides at ," (particularly describing the place of residence).

Also amend section 3 by inserting in line 29, after the words "United States," the following:

"There shall be allowed and taxed as a part of the costs in each case a fee of $3 to the United States district attorney or his assistant, the State's prosecuting attorney, or his assistant, for representing the Government in such case." prosecuting attorney, or his assistant to such case."

The bill was favorably reported by your committee in the Fifty-second Congress. The following report then made is hereby adopted:

"The provisions of the bill are as follows:

"Section 1 provides that no alien who has ever been convicted of a felony or other infamous crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude, or who is an anarchist or polygumist, or who immigrated to the United States in violation of any of their laws, or who can not read the Constitution of the United States, shall be naturalized by any court: nor unless he has resided continuously for five years next preceding his application within the United States, and for one year in the State. Bistrict, or Territory in which the application is made. That no class are by this act made eligible to naturalization who are ineligible by existing law, except Indians who have adopted the customs and manners of civilized life and severed their tribal relations. "Section 2 prescribes a form of petition for naturalization and its verification.

"Section 2 prescribes a form or petition of hardest action.
"Section 3 provides for the docketing and hearing of such petitions, and for the United States to be represented thereon by the district attorney or public prosecutor, who shall deny its allegations and require proof thereof to the satisfaction of the court, and prescribes, as far as practicable, the measure and credibility of the proof.
"Section 4 prescribes a penalty for swearing falsely to such petition or to any material allegation thereof of the hearing.
"Section 5 confers jurisdiction upon and specifies the courts to hear the petitions for naturalization. In this there is some restriction of the presentlaw.

petitions for naturalization. In this there is some restriction of the present law.

"Section 6 provides that aliens who have filed their declaration of Intention to become citizens before the approval of this act shall not be affected by its provisions.

"Section 7 provides that any alien who is eligible to naturalization, except as to the requirement of five years' residence, may take a homestead on the public lands by setting forth his alien condition and intention to become a citizen in his application for the entry thereof; but that no patent shall issue to him until he is legally naturalized. Said section repeals subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 2165, Revised Statutes, and other laws in conflict with the bill. The declaration of intention, the fruitful source of the major part of the evils and frauds practiced on the law, is abolished.

"Some of the reasons which influence the committee to recommend the passage of this bill are as follows: The loose manner in which aliens have been naturalized in many places of late years has been most shameful and in utter disregard of the requirements of our laws, although they are entrely too liberal and inefficient in their provisions. Naturalization of aliens recently arrived from abroad and knowing nothing of our institutions and Government, just before elections, for the purpose of making voters, has been resorted to in several localities. In States where only the declaration of intention to become a citizen is an essential qualification of the alien to make him a voter, have the greatest frauds and most unblushing violations of the spirit of the law been perpetrated. The bill, however, does not touch the qualification of voters, except incidentally, as that power resides in the States.

"The investigations made by the Ford committee, in the Forty-ninth Con-of the spirit of the law been perpetrated. The bit, nowever, does not come the qualification of voters, except incidentally, as that power resides in the States.

"The investigations made by the Ford committee, in the Forty-ninth Congress, developed the fact, as shown by the testimony taken, that in Brooklyn one of the courts was used by imposition and fraud for naturalization purposes by a combination of lawless men, who would naturalize and thus make a full-fiedged citizen out of any alien, within three days after he landed, for the consideration of $55.

"Under a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives the 1st day of April, 1890, instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate certain alleged illegal practices of United States courts and officials connected therewith, your committee, through a subcommittee composed of Hons. A. C. Thompson, of Ohio; H. C. McCormick, of Pennsylvayia, and William C. Oates, of Alabama, among other matters investigated, found and reported to the House the following facts in regard to the naturalization of aliens in the courts of the United States at Boston, Mass.:

"The circuit court there has a clerk with two deputies, and the district court also has a clerk with two deputies.

"Some few years ago, to remedy the loose practice which prevailed in the State passed an act to regulate the practice in its own courts, and to require greater vigilance in the detection of fraud and stricter proof of the right to receive the great benefit of being adjudged a citizen of the United States. When this law was put into practice aliens no longer applied to the State courts, with rare exceptions, but went from all parts of the State, and even from some adjacent States, to Boston, where they found in the United States courts much more convenient methods of accomplishing their purposes.

"They found, from the testimony of the clerks, their deputies, and Judge states courts much more convenient methods of accomplishing their purposes.

"They found, from the testimony of the clerks, their deputies, and Judge Nelson, of the district court, the following practice to prevail:

"An alien, wishing to be naturalized, and frequently great numbers of them together are in the habit of applying to one of these clerks or one of them together are in the habit of applying to one of these clerks or one of the devenment, setting forth all the requirements of the law, which are filled up and sworn to by the applicant. This is deemed a sufficient declaration of intention, and for this work, if the clerk fills out the blank, he charges a fee f$\simes$: but if the applicant comes in with the blank he charges a fee charges $\simes$ for administering the oath. When aliens apply to become fully naturalized, the blanks are filled both for the applicant and the witnesses which he brings with him, and then the clerk or deputy, as the case may be, proceeds with the applicant and his witnesses, and sometimes quite a number of applicants at the same time, into the court room when the court is not in session, or to the door of the court room if it be in session, and in either case he says to the applicant and his witnesses: Now you are in the presence of the court, and administers the oath to him and his witnesses, retire as he asys to the applicant a fee of $\simeq$4, but if the applicant brought in his papers to his office, issues the necessary certificate, and, if he fills the blank, he charges the applicant a fee of $\simeq$4, but if the applicant brought in his papers already filled the fee is but half that sum. The judge's attention, even when present and holding court, is never called to the matter at all, unless the clerk gets up a doubt as to whether the applicant is entitled to be naturalized, and then he refers the matter to the judge's attention, in less the clerk gets up a doubt as to whether the applicant is entitled to be naturalized. Some the present and he had the prefers the mat ized, and then he refers the matter to the judge, which is not of very frequent occurrence.

"Just before elections are to be held, when there is a great pressure of applicants for naturalization, backed up by committees from the different political parties, the judges give in such cases some personal attention to these matters, but usually the applicants are put through and adjudged to be citizens of the United States by the clerk or his deputies, in the absence of the judge and without his knowledge. Neither is it the practice in such courts to make any investigation of who the witnesses are, or whether they are worthy or unworthy of credit. Any two witnesses are generally accepted as competent and credible to prove up ten cases, but the clerks say they refuse to take the testimony of the same two witnesses for more than ten applicants at one time. What a ridiculous farce! The making of citizens out of aliens, which should be a grave judicial proceeding in the exercise of a constitutional function, is left by the courts to its mere ministerial officers who can not exercise judicial power, but run the machine merely for the fees they can make out of it.

"Boston, however, is not the only place where the naturalization of aliens

"Boston, however, is not the only place where the naturalization of aliens is treated as a merely formal or clerical matter, which requires no judicial investigation; it is the rule rather than the exception. If the making of citizens of this great country is of no greater moment why not abolish is altogether and extend the privileges of citizenship to all who come to reside among us? A thing which is worth deing at all is worth doing well. In Congress is vested the power to make laws upon the subject of naturalization. The States have no power to legislate on the subject. Congress should therefore make such laws as will amply protect the States against the citizentzation of criminals, paupers, anarchists, and allens who are unworthy of a residence and much less the citizenship of the United States or of a State. Under the very liberal immigration laws, which are administered with great laxity, over a haif million of immigrants are landed on our shores. While about 50 per cent of them are desirable, and aid by their industrious and economical habits to develop our latent wealth, yet these are dearly paid for by the imposition upon the States and the great municipalities where the other 50 per cent congregate. Among them are moral and, frequently, physical lepers, whose practices and methods of life contaminate all who come in contact with them, and are horrible examples of r.ora' turpitude to our young native Americans.

"The testimony taken by the Ford committee shows that 75 per cor.'c.' all the inmates of the lunatic asylums and poorhouses of the States which they examined are of foreign birth.

"These States and communities should receive at least the protection of Congress against the making of such creatures citizens of this country. The name 'American citizen' should be esteemed as was that of 'a Roman' when Rome was the mistress of the world.

"Such pride can never be felt by our foreign-born citizens, with but few exceptions, until the process of conferring this great boom upon an alien to except and do not prohibit any person worthy to become a citizen of that great privilege. It, of course, requires more to be done by an alien to become a citizen than is required by existing law. The existing law and its administration is in many parts of the country a travesty of judicial proceedings.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GOLDZIER] proceeds I desire to say that I shall ask to be recognized in opposition to the bill and to consume as much of the time we are entitled to on this side as I may desire. If I am recognized I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman am recognized I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GOLDZIER] ten minutes in addition to the five minutes yielded to him by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to serve notice that I am opposed to this bill, and that when the proper time comes I shall ask to be heard in opposition to it.

The SPEAKER. The matter is before the House for debate. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Oates] had one hour, of which he has five minutes remaining. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Crain] to control the hour in opposition to the bill.

opposition to the bill.

Mr. GOLDZIER. I understand, then, Mr. Speaker, that I have the five minutes yielded to me by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Oates] and ten minutes more yielded to me by the gentleman from Texas?

The SPEAKER. That is a little irregular, as the gentleman from Texas has not yet been recognized. The Chair will, however, recognize him at the expiration of the time of the gentle-

Mr. GOLDZIER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to give voice to my opposition to a measure which I consider as unwise and partisan as it is un-Democratic and un-American. I am opposed not alone to the language of this bill; I am opposed from the core of my heart to the spirit that dictates a measure of this character.

From time to time in this country the naturalized citizens and those entitled to naturalization have had to bear the brunt of those entitled to induralization have had to bear the brunt of attacks made upon them by a set of people who believe that they are the Lord's anointed, destined to rule and reign, and that all others are subordinate to them and belong to a lower order of citizens. I desire to repel that sentiment, and I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I, as one of the naturalized citizens of this country, consider myself the equal in every respect of any other citizen, no matter where his cradle may have

Is there in the history, in the traditions, in the laws of America any warrant for the arrogant assumption that there exists in this country a class of citizens entitled to higher privileges, to greater consideration, to more respect than any other? If there is, I for one have failed to find it. I believe under our Constitution our citizens whether native born or naturalized are equals before the law.

The gentlemen who favor measures such as the one under consideration, whose very aim and object is that of oppressing the poor hard-working immigrant and of denying to him the rights poor hard-working immigrant and of denying to him the rights of citizenship, seem to forget that they and each of them are descendants of these self-same immigrants.

It has become fashionable in aping the aristocratic customs of Europe for Americans to trace their lineage back into past ecnuries and to claim on the score of "blood," social, and other distinctions. But even the most distinguished branches of this self-created American aristocracy must carry back their table of ancestry to some immigrant who came to America at some time or another, as poor and helpless, and in most cases as ignorant, as are those against whom they are now so loudly proclaiming.

Immigration in America is a sold as the country itself and from the beginning of the history of our country it has been deemed not a curse, as the adherents of knownothingism would now de-pict it, but as a boon to our land. The naturalization laws en-acted from time to time in the early history of the colonies show a spirit of liberality toward the immigrant which ought to bring a spirit. Of therefiley toward the immigrant which ought to bring a blush of shame to the cheeks of those who disgrace the civilization of the nineteenth century by the intolerance they exhibit toward the men who, like their forefathers, seek shelter from oppression, new homes and prosperity in the land of liberty. In Pennsylvania a law providing for naturalization was enacted in 1682 which prescribes a residence of only three months in order to entitle a foreigner to citizenship.

In 1785 the constitution of the same State provided as follows: Every foreigner of good character, who has come to settle in this State, having first taken the oath or affirmation of allegiance may purchase lands; after a residence of one year becomes a free denizen, and in two years is capable of being elected a Representative.

The early laws of other colonies contained equally liberal provisions, and throughout this legislation shows that the aim was to encourage aliens in becoming citizens and not, what seems to be the drift of the proposed laws of the present, to place obstacles be the drift of the proposed laws of the present, to place obstacles in the way of the foreigner's desire to take upon himself the duties and to acquire the rights of American citizenship.

And it is not alone in the early history of the country that the immigrant was prized. This Government has countenanced and stimulated immigration at all times. I hold in my hand a report on immigration published by the Government in 1872. The very first sentence used by Dr. Young, the chief of the Bureau of Statistics, is a stern rebule to that bigoted "aristocracy" who believe that they perform an act of charity when they permit believe that they perform an act of charity when they permit the immigrant to land upon these shores. He says in his report to the Secretary of the Treasury:

In a country like ours, possessing rich and undeveloped resources, the advent of intelligent labor has in general been cordially welcomed. The value of this addition to our material wealth has never been more appreciated than during the last decades.

Later on, in discussing the money value to the country by each immigrant, he says:

The difficulty of determining the pecuniary of material value of the foreign population who come yearly to this country is not inconsiderable, as no data are accessible by which it can be accurately ascertained. Indeed, the very attempt to do so may appear derogatory to the dignity of human nature. To regard a man merely as an automatic machine, computing his productive power, minus his running expenses, places a low estimate on a being made in the image of his Maker, and seems an insult alike to the Creator and the created. The muscular power of the laborer may be measured, but where is the meter that can mark the activity of his brain or indicate his moral force?

In making an intelligent estimate of the addition to the material wealth of his moral force?

In making an intelligent estimate of the addition to the material wealth of the country by immigration, several distinct conditions should be regarded. The character of the immigrants as industrious and law-abiding citizens, their nationalities, education, and previous condition, as well as their occupations and ages, are elements to be considered when determining their values.

Value

As regards nationality, more than one-half of those who have thus far arrived in the United States are British, and come from the United Kingdom, or from the British possessions of North America. These speak our jamage, and a large part are acquainted with our laws and institution, and are soon assimilated with and absorbed into our body-politic.

The German element comes neat, and embraces nearly two-thirds of the remainder, being at once an industrious and an intelligent people, a large proportion settling in rural districts and developing the agricultural resources of the West and South, while the remainder, consisting largely of artisans and skilled workmen, find profitable employment in the cities and artisans and skilled workmen, and prolitable employment in the cities and manufacturing towns.

The indux of Scandinavians, who have already made extensive settlements in the Northwestern States, constitutes a distinctive feature of the movement, and though but a few years since it received its first impetus, is already large and rapidly increasing. Industrious, economical, and temperate, their advent should be especially welcomed.

After a scientific research as to the pecuniary value of each immigrant, Dr. Young states his conclusions in words which form a glowing tribute to the value of the foreigner's brain and brawn which helped to bring to its present greatness this young Re-He says:

public. He says:

From the foregoing considerations, therefore, the sum of $800 seems to be the full average capital value of each immigrant. At this rate those who landed upon our shores during the year just closed added upwards of $25,000,000 to our national wealth, while during the last half century the increment from this source exceeds $6,23,80,800. It is impossible to make an intelligent estimate of the value to the country of those foreign-born citizens who brought their educated minds, their cultivated tastes, their skill in the arts, and their inventive genius. In almost every walk of life their influence has been felt. Alike in the fearful ordeal of war and in the pursuits of peace, in our legislative halls, and in the various learned professions, the adopted sons of America have attained eminence. Among the many who rendered timely aid to our country during the late war, it may seem invidious to mention a single name, except for the purpose of illustration. In the year 1639 there arrived at the port of New York, in the steamship British Queen, which sailed from the port of London, a Swedish immigrant, better known as Capt. John Ericsson. What was his value to the country, as estimated on the 9th day of March, 1862? Was it eight hundred, eight hundred thousand, or eight millions of dollars?

The rest of this pamphlet of about 250 pages consists of information for immigrants, and was destined for circulation in foreign countries to encourage immigration.

Now, what has happened that ought to change our attitude toward the immigrant?

I see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE] suggests the unhappy anarchist episode of 1886. Let me assure this gen-tleman that no man on this floor deplores these occurrences more than I do; but let me also point out to him what in his zeal he appears to forget. The anarchists were not all aliens. The intellectual head of those who were adjudged by the courts of this country of crimes which demanded the exaction of the death penalty was not a foreign-born citizen. John B. Parsons, who died on the gallows on November 11, 1837, was not only born in America, but, if my memory serves me right, in Alabama, and I have no doubt could trace his lineage back to American-born ancestors as far as ever the gentleman from Massachusetts can. Yet who would think of making native-born Americans responsible as a class for his acts or opinions?

It is as unjust to charge to the naturalized citizens the faults, the failings, the crimes of isolated individuals as it would be to condemn the population of Massachusetts for the crimes of a Jesse Pomeroy or of Dr. Webster. Who would condemn Chris-tianity because one of the spostles had proved himselfa traitor? Has the gentleman ever heard it mentioned as a reproach to the native born that a Benedict Arnold could not be found among the adopted sons of America?

In these discussions much is said by gentlemen of nativistic tendency about "our forefathers." These gentlemen should be reminded that the founders of this Government were not all descendants of the Plymouth Rock pilgrims.

I wish to call their attention to the fact that they can not turn to a page of American history, ancient or modern, which has not inscribed upon it honorable mention of the adopted sons of From the Boston massacre down to the last battle in that glorious struggle for independence which ended in the establishment of our Government, there is not a battlefield which was not reddened by the blood of foreign-born men who died for the liberty of the country of their choice.

It is but necessary to mention the names of Lafayette, Steuben, and Kosciusko, noble, wise, patriotic leaders of foreign birth, whose valiant services in the cause of liberty have been acknowledged time and again by the nation and by every true American.

Is it necessary to recall to gentlemen that at the first call to arms the German settlers in Pennsylvania, in Maryland, in the Mohawk Valley, and elsewhere throughout the colonies, eagerly and joyfully armed themselves to offer up their lives at the call of their adopted country?

Let me refer you, among others, to the records of the Provincial Council of Pennsylvania, vol. 10, page 621, showing the raising of eight companies of German volunteers in Pennsylvania and Maryland, in July, 1776.

What wealth of patriotism, what self-sacrificing devotion is disclosed in the following pathetic tale, copied from the Pennsylvania Mercury of June 19, 1775, which I append without com-

The aged as well as the young daily march out under the banners of liberty and discover a determined resolution to maintain her cause even until death. In the town of Reading, in Berks County, there had been some time past three companies formed and very forward in their exercise; since, however, we are well informed a fourth company have associated under the name of the Old Man's Company. It consists of about 80 Germans of the age of 40 and upwards. Many of them have been in the military service of Germany. The person who at their first assembling led them to the field is 97 years of age, has been forty years in the regular service and in seventeen pitched battles, and the drummer is 84. In lieu of a cockade they wear in their hats a black crape as expressive of their sorros for the mournful events which have occasioned them at their late time of life to take arms against their brethren in order to preserve that liberty which they left their native country to enjoy.

Speaking of our forefathers, let me remind the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Morse] of the fact that among the signers of the Declaration of Independence there were a number of foreign-born citizens, and let me tell him that in the name of the naturalized citizens of America, in the name of that class of our population which has at all times in the history of this country responded patriotically to every call America has made upon it— that I claim these men, who risked their lives that liberty might live, despite the fact that they were foreigners—as our forefa-

The great men of Revolutionary times have on every occasion gratefully acknowledged the indebtedness of America to its foreign-born population; and among thousands of proofs of this assertion let me insert here what was said by the foremost of all Americans, by George Washington, in answer to an address of the Irish Catholics.

As mankind become more liberal, they will be more apt to allow that all those who conduct themselves as worthy members of the community are equally entitled to the protection of civil government. I hope ever to see America among the foremost nations in examples of justice and liberality. And I presume that your fellow-citizens will not forget the patriotic part they took in the accomplishment of their revolution and the establishment of their government, or the important assistance which they received from a nation in which the Roman Catholic faith is professed.

What a glorious sentiment by a glorious man; but what a bit-ter contrast to the narrow-minded spirit of illiberality of to-day that inspires laws which make it the duty of United States officials to defend against (i. c., if possible, to defeat) the petition of the sturdy emigrant, who, after years of residence and good behavior, seeks American citizenship in order that he may cease to be an alien in his new home, and may be permitted to take upon himself the duties and responsibilities of a citizen.

A like spirit of liberality and the desire to pay tribute to the foreign-born element for their valor and bravery is evinced by foreign-born element for their valor and bravery is evinced by George Parke Custis, Washington's adopted son, who embalmed his sentiments upon this subject in a poem inscribed "to the friends of civil and religious liberty," which gentlemen will find published in the National Intelligencer of October 14, 1828.

Passing from old history to the present, we find that in our long struggle for national unity, as in the war for independence, the part taken by the naturalized citizen was great, and sheds a luster around these where relevants are deventions.

luster around those whose valor, whose devotion and patriotism upheld and strengthened the nation in the hour of her greatest

It is impossible to go into details; but if you pass in muster the roll of honor of those who paid with their lives for the privileges of American citizenship; if you find where the strife was thickest, where death resped its greatest harvest, you will find that the foreign-born citizen was there in greatest numbers. If you review the names of those to whom the nation owes a debt of gratitude in return for their sacrifices of life and blood; if you recall those to whom we have erected monuments in every nock and corner of this great Union you will find unnumbered thousands among these whose cradles stood on foreign shores and over whose bodies alien mothers wept their bitter tears.

Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I stood upon the battlefield at Fredericksburg, and with a feeling of awe I trod the very ground which was moistened on that sad December day in 1862 by the blood of brave soldiers. In my thoughts I reviewed those brave among the brave, Meagher's Irish brigade, as they advanced once, and again and again towards those impregnable heights, to be repulsed again and again. I saw, through the vision of mind, the sad rally of these troops after the din of battle was over, and I saw that of the twelve hundred who had greeted the dawning of that fatal day, barely two hundred and fifty responded to the roll call at night

I stood upon the very spot upon that battlefield where one of my near kin, a brave soldier and a good patriot, died for his and my country leading his regiment (the gallant Sixty-sixth New York Volunteers) to a forlorn hope in his attack upon the stone buttress of the sunken road. And as I stood, the words of stone buttress of the sunken road. And as I stood, the words of the poet, penned in memory of that battle, recurred to my mind, and involuntarily my lips spoke:

They closed the ledger and they stilled the loom, The plow left rusting in the prairie farm; They saw but Union in the gathering gloom, The tearless women helped the men to arm.

Brigades from towns, each village sent its band, German and Irish, every race and faith: There was no question then of native land, But love the flag and follow it to death.

If sacrifices of life are to be weighed in the scales which de-termine our right to live in and be citizens of the land of the brave and the home of the free, then the foreign-born citizen who has given to America hostages of his fidelity in measureless streams of blood, is entitled not alone to residence and citizenship, but I say to you of American birth, he is entitled to more He has a right to be treated in this country not as one who holds by mere sufferance a citizen of a lower order, but he has a sacred claim on you, men of American birth, which should impel you to regard and treat him as your brother, in peace as he your brother in war,

That this is not the spirit which animates the measure under consideration is shown by the bill itself and by the report which accompanies it. This report, which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] asks to print in the RECORD, contains upon its face a slur so manifestly untrue and so malicious a libel upon the foreign-born population that I can not proceed in this argument without giving it the most direct contradiction.

In this report the gentleman says that the testimony taken by the Ford committee shows that 75 per cent of the inmates of all the lunatic asylums and poorhouses are of foreign birth. This statement is absolutely unwarranted by the facts.

Mr. OATES. I state, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. GOLDZIER. I can not permit the gentleman to waste any of my time.

Mr. OATES. But you are denying a statement that I have

Mr. GOLDZIER. I can not permit the gentleman to interrupt

Mr. OATES. You get the proof and see whether that statement is correct or not.

Mr. GOLDZIER. I have the proof right here.
Mr. OATES. You have the testimony?
Mr. GOLDZIER. I have the proof right here.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to be

Mr. GOLDZIER. If the Ford committee, of which the gentleman from Alabama was a member, had taken the trouble to consult the census of 1880; if they had resorted to the records, they would never in this manner have vilified the good name and fame of the immigrants into this country.

What does the census show? The census shows, as far as the insane population is concerned, the following total results: Of the insane in the whole United States the native element further in the whole United States the native element further in the whole united states the native element further in the whole united states the native element further in the whole united states the native element further in the whole united states the native element further in the whole united states the native element further in the whole united states the native element further in the whole united states are states as the insane in the whole united states are st nishes 65,630, and the foreign-born element furnishes 26,329. Thus the percentage instead of being 75 is less than 33 per cent. It shows, furthermore, that not only is it untrue that 75 per cent of those who fill the almshouses are foreigners, but it is untrue that that is the case in any single State in the Union, and there are only three or four States in which the foreign element exceeds the native-born element.

Concerning almshouses, this same document (and I presume it is as reliable as the report of the Ford committee) shows the total number of native-born inmates of almshouses as 44,106, and foreign born 22,961; and it shows in the whole United States but two States, California and New York, where the number of foreign-born people in the almshouses exceeds that of the native

Among the provisions in this bill which show the animus of the measure and the arrogance of the class that fathers it, is the educational qualification it provides for in requiring the appli-cant to be able to read the Constitution of the United States. Admitting even that this qualification should be a prerequisite to citizenship, it should be enforced alike against natives as well as against the foreign born. It ill becomes the gentleman hailing from the State of Alabama to insert in his bill such a provision, while the statistics show that in his own State the illiteracy of the native-born white population exceeds that of the foreign-born population in any State to a degree which is scarcely redible.

Referring again to the census, it shows that in the State of Alabama, the State from which the gentleman hails, the illiteracy of the white population—not the blacks—the illiteracy of the white native-born population is 25 per cent, while the illiteracy of the foreign-born population is 7.7 per cent. It shows further, in a number of tables, that throughout the South the percentage is substantially the same; that in Arkansas, for instance, another State in which immigration is inconsiderable, the illiteracy is 25.5 per cent of the native-born white population and the illiteracy of the foreign-born is 5.6 per cent; that in Virginia, within the very shadow of this Capitol, within the reach almost of my voice, the illiteracy of the white native-born population is 18.5 per cent, while the illiteracy of the foreign-born element is 5.4 per cent. It shows further that in all those States that have been blessed, and I say blessed advisedly, by immigration the state of education among the people is much higher than it is in States such as that represented by the gentleman to which there has been but little immigration.

These stubborn, disagreeable figures show further that in Alabama, where the foreign-born population amounts to less than 8 per cent, the number of those persons over 10 years of age able to read amounts to 43.5 per cent, while in Minnesota, which has over 33 per cent of foreign-born inhabitants, the percentage is 3.7; in Illinois, with one-sixth foreign-born element, 4.3 per cent illiterates; in Nebraska, with about one-sixth foreign born, cent interaces; in New York, with about 25 per cent of for-eign-born inhabitants, the percentage is 4.2.

I hope that these figures will convince my friend from Ala-bama that illiteracy and immigration do not go hand in hand as he seems to imagine, but that other causes exist for lack of education wherever it exists.

What these causes are, at least so far as the gentleman's home What these causes are, at least solar as the genumenan's nome State is concerned, is again shown by these persistent figures. Alabama, with a population of 1,262,505, spends upon her schools the magnificent sum of $430,131 annually, or about 30 cents per head of the population. The poor foreign-born farmer of Minnesota, who forms one-third of the population, the man against whose illiteracy we must be quarded, with a population of 180. sots, who forms one-third of the population, the man against whose illiteracy we must be guarded, with a population of 780,-773, spends upon his schools $1,622,919, over $2 per head of population, or seven times as much in proportion as Alabama. In Nebraska the proportion is about the same, while in New York and my home State, Illinois, the per capita expenditure for school purposes amounts to almost $2.50 per head of population.

I might leave this part of the discussion here. It is patent that the educational test which the gentleman proposes would touch very few immigrants whose naturalization is desirable.

touch very few immigrants whose naturalization is desirable, I have paid attention to it solely for the purpose of showing the animus which permeates this bill, and I desire to add but one sentiment.

If the gentleman from Alabama is unable to curb his fervor in behalf of education in America, let me suggest to him that of education in America, let me suggest to him that Alabama is a good State in which to commence his labors.

As to the further objectionable provisions in this bill, it ought properly to be termed "a law to make a monopoly of American citizenship," a monopoly for those who have time and money in order to obtain it.

If this bill should be enacted into law the property qualification which the gentleman from Massachusetts so earnestly hopes for would become unnecessary. The laboring man, the mechanic, the farmer, to whom the lengthy procedure of the trial provided for in the act means loss of much valuable time, would be most effectually barred from citizenship. The poor man, to whom the expense of this proceeding might mean the cost of sustaining his family for a week or over, would be forced to relinquish the pleasures of citizenship, and in course of time this gentleman might reach the goal of his ambition and could enjoy the rights of his citizenship (due in his case to the chance of birth) with but a select company of kindred spirits who believe in the motto "Dollars make men."

Another one of the provisions of this act reads as follows:

Upon such hearing the United States shall be represented by the district attorney or his assistant, and if in a State court the State may be represented by the United States district attorney or State's attorney, prosecutor, or solicitor, whose duty it shall be to defend the Government against

In other words, it is made the duty of the attorney representing the United States to take the poor immigrant who is on the stand defenseless and alone examine him, cross-examine him, ply him with questions pertinent and impertment, harass him, torture him, in short, use every known trick of the law in order to prevent him from attaining his object and the United States from receiving into her arms a citizen who by a five years' resi-dence and by good behavior has shown that he is worthy of the dence and by good behavior has shown that he is worthy of the honor. It provides further that the poor man who is an applicant for citizenship must not only lose his time by leaving his work in attending upon the filing of his petition and the trial, but must also pay the cost of the proceeding, including a $3 fee, which the gentleman from Alabama has so benevolently provided, shall be paid in order to secure the services of this district atterney, whose haviness it is to defeat the petition of the trict attorney, whose business it is to defeat the petition of the poor immigrant. Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GOLDZIER.

Yes, sir. Would you have any laws in regard to nat-Mr. MILLIKEN. uralization at all-

Mr. GOLDZIER. Most unquestionably I would.
Mr. MILLIKEN. Or would you let every man vote as soon as he comes here from a foreign country?
Mr. GOLDZIER. I would have a law which would facilitate the admission of any decent man to citizenship of the United

Mr. MILLIKEN. I agree with you on that.

Mr. GOLDZIER. But I would have no law which in spirit and in language has for its object the defeating of the purpose of naturalization, and which would swamp us with a population prevented by law from becoming citizens, without interest in the country or its institutions, and without the feeling of allegiance country or its institutions, and without the feeling of allegiance which comes with citizenship.

Let me say to the gentleman from Maine that I believe in excluding, by wise and just legislation, such elements of immigration as after mature deliberation we shall determine are injurious to our body politic, but I believe in excluding them at the very threshold. And I believe further that our present immigration laws, if honestly enforced, will answer the purpose. I believe, on the other hand, that the best interests of the country require that to those whom we admit to residence the road to require that to those whom we admit to residence the road to citizenship should be smoothened instead of impeded, so that if the time should come again when a call is made upon the citizens of this commonwealth, a call for the highest sacrifice which man can make—blood and life—there should be few persons within our borders who do not owe allegiance to our Government, our Constitution, and our flag.

Let me state in addition that chief among those whom I would exclude, both from residence and citizenship, is that class of immigrant for whose advent the grasping greed of the native-born mine owner and manufacturer is responsible. I would exclude the contract laborers, imported in masses. irrespective of quality, with sole regard for the cheapness of their labor, imported for the one purpose of putting more money in the plethoric purses of American monopolists.

But let me return for a moment to the provisions of this bill. In the concluding remarks of his report the gentleman from Alabama says: "The name 'American citizen' should be esteemed as was that of 'a Roman,' when Rome was the mistress of the world." I applaud that sentiment. I adopt it, and honor the proud spirit which caused it to be penned. It could inspire were it not for the fact that the bill which this report accompanies is sadly at variance with that sentence

What safeguards do you provide for the right of acquiring this priceless boon, this proud distinction? In every State in this Union in a controversy involving a paltry sum of money, the law provides an appeal to the party who feels that injustice is done him by a judgment.

In the trial for which this law provides to obtain the cherished right of citizenship no such provision is made, and the man who right of citizenship no such provision is made, and the man who is denied this right by the ignorance, the corruption, the partisanship of some judge, or the cunning trickery of some lawyer, is turned away without remedy. No appeal is allowed him from the most grievous injustice which may be done.

Rightless and remediless some man whose heart may be yearning for admittance into the brotherhood of citizens of this Republic, some man of purest motives, of noble character, may be denied this right and have officed to him forward or the contract of the state of denied this right, and have affixed to him forever and ever the stigma of having been solemnly adjudged unfit to be civis Americanum.

Does the gentleman say that this is just? Does he claim it is

Does the gentleman say that this is just? Does he claim it is right?
Our immigrants of old had a higher, a better, conception of the value and solemnity of naturalization.

Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I came across some old volumes of Pennsylvania Colonial Records dealing with the early history of that sturdy race to which we are indebted for some of the best men which the country produced—the Germans of Pennsylvania.

From time to time these records would show a number of men as having gone to the county seat to "take the sacrament," and I ascertained that this term in the quaint language of that people meant taking the oath of allegiance.

So sacred was to them this function, that it formed a part and parcel of their religion, and thus acquired the very name of a religious exercise.

Let me assure you that the spirit which made a sacrament of the ceremony of naturalization is as strong to-day among the foreign-born population as it ever was.

No danger will ever come to the institutions of America from her foreign-born citizens. Speaking as one of them, and as one who knows them, I say to you that we have ever considered our oath of allegiance a solemn and binding compact; and I challenge proof of its having ever been violated.

If the foreign-born retains and cherishes a fond recollection of the land of his birth, who can reproach him for it? Does it lessen his love and devotion for the land of his free choice? Does the affection of a man for his mother lessen his ardent, impassionate, undying love for his wife?

Remember, you men of American birth, that as you proudly call this land the land of your fathers, it is to us as near and as dear. It is the home of those to whom we are bound with like ties of love and devotion. It is the land of our children.

In the name of the foreign-born element in America I entreat you do not enact a law which will revive the memory of the dark, Know-nothing times, a measure which is unjust to the foreigner and a discredit to the native-born. Let ovenhanded justice reign among all the elements which compose this great nation; be just to the foreign-born, and grant him the privilege to live for his country, and if ever the necessity arises he will cherish the privilege of dying for the land which has adopted him.

FREDERICKSBURG, DECEMBER 13, 1862. [John Boyle O'Reilly.]

- God send us peace, and keep red strife away: But should it come, God send us men and steel! The land is dead that dare not face the day When foreign danger threatens common weal.
- Defenders strong are they that homes defend; From ready arms the spoiler keeps afar, Well blest the country that has sons to lend, From trades of peace to learn the trade of war,
- Thrice blest the nation that has every son A soldier, ready for the warning sound, Who marches homeward when the fight is done To swing the hammer and to till the ground.
- Call back that morning, with its lurid light,
 When through our land the awful war-bell tolled,
 When lips were mute, and women's faces white,
 As the pale cloud that out from Sunter rolled.
- Call back that morn; an instant all were dumb, As if the shot had struck the Nation's life; Then cleared the smoke, and rolled the calling drum, And men streamed in to meet the coming strife.
- They closed the ledger and they stilled the loom, The plow left rusting in the prairie farm; They saw but "Union" in the gathering gloom, The tearless women helped the men to arm.
- Brigades from towns—each village sent its band; German and Irish—every race and faith; There was no question then of native land, But—love the flag and follow it to death.
- No need to tell their tale: through every age The splendid story shall be sung and said; But let me draw one picture from the page— For words of song embalm the hero dead.
- The smooth hill is bare, and the cannons are planted Like Gorgon fates shading its terrible brow; The word has been passed that the stormers are wanted, And Burnside's battalions are mustering now.
- The armies stand by to behold the dread meeting;
 The work must be done by a desperate few;
 The black-mouthed guns on the height give them greeting—
 From gun mouth to plain every grass-blade in view.
- Strong earthworks are there, and the rifles behind them Are Georgia militia—an Irish brigade— Their caps have green badges, as if to remind them Of all the brave record their country has made.
- The stormers go forward—the Federals cheer them; They breast the smooth hillside, the black mouths are dumb; The rifemen lie in the works till they near them, And cover the stormers as upward they come.
- Was ever a death march so grand and so solemn? At last the dark summit with flame is enlined; The great guus belch doom on the sacrificed column, That reels from the height, leaving hundreds behind.
- s are hushed—there is no cause for cheering: The fail of brave men to brave men is pain.

 Again come the stormers! and as they are ner
 The flame-sheeted rifle lines reel back again.
- And so till full noon come the Federal masses— Flung back from the height, as the cliff flings a wave; Brigade on brigade to the death struggle passes, No wavering rank till it steps on the grave.
- Then comes a brief luli, and the smoke pall is lifted, The green of the hillside no longer is seen; The dead soldiers lie as the seaweed is drifted, The earthworks still held by the badges of green.
- Have they qualled? is the word. No; again they are forming— Again comes a column to death and defeat! What is it in these who shall now do the storming That makes every Georgian spring to his feet
- "O God! What a pity!" they cry in their cover,
 As rifies are readled and bayonets made tight,
 "Tis Meagher and his fellows, their caps have green
 "Tis Greek to Greek now for the rest of the light!
- Twelve hundred the column, their rent flag before them, With Meagher at their head, they have dashed at the hill! Their foemen are proud of the country that bore them; But, Irish in love, they are enemies still.
- Out rings the fierce word, "Let them have it!" the rifles Are emptied point blank in the hearts of the foe; It is green against green. but a principle stifles The Irishman's love in the Georgian's blow.
- The column has recied, but it is not defeated:
 In front of the guns they re-form and attack;
 Six times they have done it, and six times retreated;
 Twelve hundred they come, and two hundred go back.

Two hundred go back with the chivalrous story; The wild day is closed in the night's solemn shroud; A thousand He dead, but their death was a glory That calls not for tears—the Green Badges are proud!

Bright honor be theirs who for honor were fearless, Who charged for their flag to the grim cannon's mouth; And hence to them who were true, though not tearless— Who bravely that day kept the cause of the South.

The quarrel is done—God avert such another;
The lesson it brought we should evermore heed:
Who loveth the flag is a man and a brother.
No matter what birth, or what race, or what creed.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, the debate on this bill was entered on unexpectedly to me yesterday, and I have not had the time to give to its provisions the full consideration which I would have been glad to have devoted to them. It is entitled "A bill to amend the naturalization laws of the United States." At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to the title so as to make it read, "A bill to resurrect Knownothingiam in the

The provision of the first section of the bill in reference to the naturalization of aliens simply prohibits the naturalization of desirable foreigners who having come here expect to become

The proposition that no alien shall ever be admitted to citizenship within the United States who has ever been convicted of a felony or other infamous crime or misdemeanor involving turpitude—"moral turpitude" is the language of the bill—or who is an anarchist or a polygamist is practically a nullity. It is a nullity for the simple reason, Mr. Speaker, that the laws of our country prohibit the immigration of such people. No individual embraced within the definition of any one of these terms can be legally admitted into the United States, and therefore the inhibition against the naturalization as a citizen of this country of such person is simply farcical if our laws upon the subject of immigration are enforced. One object, then, of this law is what? To prohibit practically the extension of American citizenship to people of foreign birth who land upon our shores and cast their lot here with the intention of bettering their fortunes and spending their lives in this country.

Now, I think, sir, in view of the statement in the report of the committee on the bill, that 500,000 immigrants are yearly entering this country, we ought not to throw restrictions around them, and that we should not provide that two and a half millions of them may be here as parasites, instead of being incorporated and merged in the American body politic. I say 2,500,000 because the first instalment of 500,000 will be compelled to remain five years before being admitted to citizenship, and at the expiration of that time 2,000,000 more will have entered the United States, so that time 2,000,000 more will have entered the United States, so that there will always be two and a half millions of aliens among our people denied the right of citizenship, because they have not lived five years in this country.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Do you believe that anarchists or criminals should be admitted as members of our body politic?

Mr. CRAIN. My dear sir, under our laws you can not have anarchists or criminals in the country, who come from abroad, if the officers of the law perform their duty. Because under the act of March 3, 1891, and the supplementary act of 1893, called the Stump act, which we passed, you being a member of that Congress as well as myself, that class of people is excluded and can not come into the country at all, and hence can not apply for citizenship. Mr. MILLIKEN. N. Will you allow another question? Well, my time is so limited that I dislike to Mr. CRAIN. yield. If I am interrupted in this manner I shall have to ask for an extension of my time.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I merely wish to ask if my friend does not know, notwithstanding the laws, that as a matter of fact a great many of this class of people do come or creep into this country; and because they do happen to come in, does the gentleman think they ought to be privileged to assume the right of citizenship under our laws?

Mr. CRAIN. No, sir. There is a law against murder and yet murders are daily perpetrated.

Mr. DINSMORE. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly.

Mr. DINSMORE. The gentleman, as I understand it, speaks of a deserving class or a desirable class of immigrants.

Mr. CRAIN. I used the word "desirable." I said that the desirable class of immigrants should be absorbed in the body politic.

Mr. DINSMORE. Then, as it is true that certain undesirable classes do come by some means, does the gentleman think that they would be less objectionable to us, and that their influence would be less petent for evil, if they should be made citizens and have conferred upon them the right of suffrage under our laws:

Mr. CRAIN. No; certainly not. But there is a provision in the bill that the statements of any man who wants to become a citizen shall be corroborated by two witnesses; but it does not extend to anything occurring when he was not in this country. It will be se

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow just one more question.

Mr. CRAIN. I can not yield. I must beg to be allowed to proceed without interruption.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I wanted to ask the gentleman, if he is correct in his statement that these men can not come in, whether this bill can do any harm?

Mr. CRAIN. Well, I say for that reason the inhibition of them is a fraud.

Assuming that the officers of the law, Mr. Speaker, perform their duty, there will be very few of that class of persons here; but I care nothing for that provision of the bill. I simply make these remarks in criticism of it and to show that the effect of the section will be not to place a bar or restriction upon underlable immigrants, but will be a hindrance and an obstruction to those who are desirable, and that the trend of the whole bill is in that direction.

Why hamper immigrants? Why prevent the immigrants who come here from becoming American citizens? What is the matter with the laws you now have in force? If properly carried ter with the laws you now have in force? If properly carried out they are adequate to protect us from any abuse of citizenship. The report itself says that there have been gross violations of the law in Boston and elsewhere. Because the officers of the United States courts, in the instance cited in the report, have failed to do their duty, because forecoth in Boston, New York, and other large cities there may have been violations of the naturalization laws, either have converted on the resulting laws. ralization laws, either by corruption or by negligence, are we to deny to the alien who comes to this country, intending to make it his home and to become a part of us, the right to become an American citizen?

The provisions of this bill are a practical denial of that right on account of the burdensome conditions they impose. When a man applies by petition in the nature of a suit in court, in law or equity, to become a citizen of the country, he is to allege, under the provisions of the bill, that he is not an anarchist or a polygamist, that he has not been convicted of a felony or other in-famous crime involving moral turpitude. He must also allege famous crime involving moral turpitude. He must also allege affirmatively that he can read the Constitution. Why not read the Bible? Is it because you want him to understand what is in the Constitution that you put that provision in the bill? Is that the reason?

Mr. OATES. That is one of the reasons.
Mr. CRAIN. Why, my dear sir, there is not a Democrat upon the floor of this House who will not dispute with a Republican on the other side as to the meaning of certain paragraphs and sections in the Constitution, and yet you would have an immigrant, a stranger to our laws, customs, and the decisions of the courts, determine, by construction and interpretation, the meaning of the provisions of the organic instrument of this Government.

Mr. OATES. Would it not be better to have a man able to give some construction one way or the other?

Mr. GOLDZIER. I would like to make the suggestion that under that provision of this bill it would be difficult for a blind man to become a citizen of the United States.

Mr. OATES. We do not want any blind immigrant to make a citizen out of.

Mr. CRAIN. I will ask the gentleman who is the father of this bill [Mr. OATES] to explain why he requires a foreigner who desires to become a citizen of this country to have an edu-cational qualification when all over the South there are millions of people who are to-day citizens of the United States, and who can not read the Constitution, and many of whom do not know the alphabet. We already have a too extended suffrage.

Mr. OATES Mr. MILLIKEN. How many of them do you allow to vote, and how many of their votes do you count after they are cast?

Mr. CAMPBELL. They do that down in Maine.

Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Maine

The SPEAKER. One moment. Gentlemen desiring to interrupt should address the Chair, so that the gentleman who has the floor may have the privilege of saying whether he yields or not.

Mr. CRAIN. There are millions of voters in this country, many of whom do not live in the South, illiterate whites, who have the right of suffrage, and not a few of them live in the State which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] has the honor in part to represent.

We do not want to deny the right to vote to the colored people of the South, because we propose to stand by them in the exercise of a right that was conferred upon them by the Republican party and which has turned out to be a boomerang for that party. It has given us representation that we do not desire to yield up, and gives us a power on the floor of this House which the gendeman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] and his colleagues would deprive us of if they had the opportunity to do so. Mr. MILLIKEN. I have no doubt you thank the Republican

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have no doubt you thank the Republican party for giving you that power.

Mr. OATES. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CRAIN] that in my opinion one of the evils from which this country suffers is a too extended suffrage.

Mr. CRAIN. Well, that may be true; but at the same time why grant the right of suffrage to certain classes who are illitated and the suffrage to certain classes who are illitated by the countries and who erate and deny it to men who come from other countries and who wish to become citizens of this country because they may be unable to read the Constitution? In other words, why prescribe an educational qualification for them which is not applied to

Mr. OATES. Because those who are already citizens have the right; and besides, a man who is raised here, though illiterate, having lived under the influence of the Constitution and of our institutions, will understand those institutions a great deal better than an illiterate man who has lived all his life under a different form of government.

Mr. CRAIN. That is a curious argument from a gentleman who represents a State in which the colored people so largely predominate, many of whom do not know much about any con-

Mr. OATES. My good friend had better inform himself when he says the colored people predominate in my State, because the white people are in the majority by a very large number, nearly

Mr. CRAIN. I will withdraw the word "predominate." Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I venture to suggest to the gentle-Mr. REED. man not to withdraw that word-

Mr. CRAIN. I should have said in a State where the colored people form a large proportion of the voting population.

Mr. OATES. That is true.
Mr. CRAIN. And from a section of the country where the constitution of a certain State has a similar qualification in it.

Mr. REED. I really hope the gentleman from Texas will not withdraw that statement. It might lead to a valuable discus-

mr. CRAIN. The gentleman from Alabama said he was opposed to the extension of the right of suffrage. I did not intend to be personal to the gentleman when I used the word "predominate." I employed the wrong term.

Mr. OATES. I understand that.

Mr. CRAIN. Did the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] desire to propound a question to me?

Mr. REED. I simply desired to express the hope that the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] would not withdraw. I should like to have them go further into this matter. It might lead to something important further into this matter. It might lead to something important to the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAIN. That is a question that demands no answer at my hands. It is merely a suggestion from the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. Yes; a very kindly suggestion.
Mr. CRAIN. Well, will you be the referee?
Mr. REED. I would; yes.
Mr. CRAIN. There would be no decision then. You would let us fight it out.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; there would be a decision. I would agree

Mr. CRAIN. Another objection to this bill is in the fact that by its terms and in repealing subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 2165 of the Revised Statutes it thereby repeals another section, which provides that any alien who has been honorably discharged from the Army or Navy of the United States need not prove up five years' residence in order to become a citizen; and the first section as well as the last provides that no alien can become a citizen until he shall have resided in the United States five consecutive years, and that all laws in conflict with the provisions of the bill are repealed.

The bill repeals a section of the Revised Statutes which provides that any foreign-born sailor who has served on a merchant vessel for three years, and has a certificate to that effect, shall not be required to prove up the five years' residence in order to become a citizen. It also repeals another section of the Revised Statutes which provides that when an alien has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States at least two years before the expiration of the five years' limitation of residence and dies before he has acquired full citizenship, his widow and his children shall be deemed to be citizens of the United States.

I do not know whether the committee that reported this bill intended the repeal of these sections or whether they were over looked in its consideration; but the fact remains that all of these sections, two of which are incorporated in the original naturalization laws, and the third enacted since the close of the war, would be repealed by this act. I shall not read them, Mr. Speaker, because I have not the time; but my statement of their contents and of the effect of the passage of this bill with reference

The second section shows exactly what is meant, when taken in connection with the report of the committee on the provisions of the bill. It is calculated to restrict the right of suffrage. It is not intended to prevent undesirable immigrants from becoming citizens of the United States, for our present laws are a sufficient safeguard against them. Its object is to hamper, restrain, and harass any alien who desires to become a citizen by compelling him to submit to regulations which are onerous, expensive, and vexatious, although the committee's report says that the real intention of the bill is to enable a foreign-born citizen to point with pride to the fact that he has become a citizen of this great, grand, and glorious Republic.

Mr. OATES. It is not the object, but that is the effect.
Mr. CRAIN. The gentleman says that that is not the object, but that is the effect. I accept the amendment.

Mr. OATES. It is a matter for the State to determine who shall have the right to vote.

Mr. CRAIN. Certainly; but do you not restrict that right when you say in your report you are opposed to the State laws, and when you provide that a man shall not vote after he has de-clared his intention of becoming a citizen? That is what you do.

Mr. OATES. That is a fact. Mr. CRAIN. Certainly; then, do you not restrict, incidentally, the right of suffrage?

Mr. OATES. Oh, yes; but it does not prescribe qualifications for voters

Mr. CRAIN. You say so in your report.

Mr. OATES. No.
Mr. CRAIN. I beg your pardon. I read from the report of the committee this statement:

The bill, however, does not touch the qualifications of voters, except incientally, as the power rests in the States.

Incidentally! How incidentally? By saying that no man shall Incidentally! How incidentally? By saying that no man shall be made a citizen at all until he shall have resided continuously for five years in the United States. Can States then confer the right of suffrage upon him, whereas now, as soon as he sets his foot upon American soil, he can declare his intention to become a citizen, and the State may give him the right to vote? You take away from him the right to declare his intention to become a citizen, and thereby deprive the State of the right to give him the power to vote. After such declaration, and in your report, you say that in States where the declaration of intention is the only qualification essential to make the declarant a voter have the greatest frauds been perpetrated.

have the greatest frauds been perpetrated.

Mr. OATES. You have got that wrong.

Mr. CRAIN. I am reading the bill.

Mr. OATES. If the statute requires them to declare their intention to become citizens, the State would not have to change that in order to make him a voter. But if the law of the State only allows naturalized foreigners to vote, that would require to be changed so as to allow those aliens who have only declared their intentions to become citizens to vote.

Mr. CRAIN. But, Mr. Speaker, the State of Texas gives any alien the right to vote who has declared his intention to become a citizen who may have resided in the State and county a certain

Mr. OATES. How long?
Mr. CRAIN. Twelve months in the State and a shorter period in the county of his residence. You take that away by repealing the section of the Revised Statutes to which I refer. How, then, can the State go on and give such a man the right to vote after you have repealed the statute providing for a declaration of intention on his part to become a citizen?

Mr. OATES. Why certainly it can. It has the right. The power to determine who shall be voters rests in the States all the time. The States can say even that boys and children may the time. The States can say even that boys and children may vote, or women, or whomsoever they please.

Mr. CRAIN. But when you repeal the law on declaration of intention how can the States provide that a man may vote upon such declaration? The States can say who shall not vote.

Mr. OATES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAIN. And when they do, except in certain cases, their representation in the electoral cells as and in the Harris.

Mr. Ohain. And when they do, except in certain cases, their representation in the electoral college and in the House of Representatives is diminished in proportion as the citizens of said States are deprived of the right of suffrage, according to the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, which would have to be altered or repealed before you could have such a law in any of the States.

Mr. OATES. Not at all. Mr. CRAIN. That is my opinion.

The SPEAKER. The hour has expired.
Mr. CRAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to the extension of my time, on account of the numerous interruptions.

The SPEAKER. The hour has expired.

Mr. CRAIN. Then I should like to resume the floor when this matter comes up for consideration again.

this matter comes up for consideration again.

Mr. OATES. It goes back on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The matter will not come up again until it is reached on the Calendar.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave be granted some other gentlemen who expected to speak on this subject and who have remarks prepared already to print them in the RECORD.
Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, no.

Mr. OATES. Some of them are on one side and some on the

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill No. 1 as amended by the Senate, be taken up and considered to-day and to-morrow, with such amendments as may be offered in ten-minuto speeches; and to-morrow afternoon, at 5 o'clock, the vote shall be taken first on such amendments as are pending, then upon the substitute as offered by the Senate.

I want to say this, Mr. Speaker—we have got to come to a vote on this question. We have been here for months, during which many of us have not been at home. We want to adjourn the House. We can make nothing by delay, and if the friends of silver object to this proposition, the probability is that a month of the proposition of the probability is that a month of the proposition of the probability is that a month of the proposition of the probability is that a month of the proposition of the probability is that a month of the probability is th tion will be made for the previous question to-morrow when the bill comes up under the rule, and we shall have no debate, but will have to come to a direct vote.

My request is that, in deference to the men who are opposed to this bill, we may have to-day and to-morrow to discuss the substitute and amendments, and that at 5 morrow to discuss the substitute and amendments, and that at o o'clock to morrow the vote be taken. That is liberal to those of us who differ with the conclusion of the Senate, and I ask the friends of repeal to give us that little favor.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman's proposition is, I understand, to immediately take up the bill and proceed to debate it?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is my proposition, that the House take the bill up now.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I agree to that.

Mr. BLAND. There is nothing in this bill to distinguish it from other bills in the treatment to which it is entitled. It is not hedged about by any peculiarities that require it to be shoved in here contrary to the rules of the House. When it comes up to-morrow morning we shall have to say on that occasion what we deem proper. I think the bill ought to come up in its reg-Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is my proposition.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate further insisted upon its amendment, No. 6, to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

DONATION OF AN OLD CANNON.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Specker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk

The joint resolution (H. Res. 83) was read, as follows:

esolved, etc., That one of the abandoned cannons now at the United States enal at Pittsburg, Pa., and there before the late war, be donated to the zens committee having charge of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in Pittsburg in 1894, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to deliver said cannon to said committee

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference

The conference report was read, as follows:

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. JOSEPH D. SAYERS.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS, L. F. LIVINGSTON, J. G. CANNON, Managers on the part of the House,

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of the conference report, I have to inform the House that the conferees have agreed upon the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5. The first amendment provides that out of the sums of money heretofore appropriated for Solomon's Lump light-house and Wolf Trap light-house the two houses shall be constructed. The trouble is that the appropriation made by the last Congress for one of these light-houses was too large, and the appropriation for the other too small. The Senate amendment provides that the entire sum may be used for the construction of both. As to the second amendment, it makes no appropriation, but only provides that out of the funds already appropriated the Board of Lady Managers may issue diplomas to the skilled workmen who executed the work which has been on exhibition at the Columbian Exposition.

It will be remembered that at the last session of the Fiftysecond Congress something over $500,000 was appropriated to pay the expenses of referees and awards. Those awards go only to the exhibitors. The proposition involved in this amendment is to issue diplomas to those skilled artisans who executed the work which has been exhibited.

Items four and five contain appropriations for the benefit of the Senate. One is $7,000 for miscellaneous items. The other is for the payment of a clerk to a Senator who did not qualify as Senator until the 16th of August last, whereas he was entitled to a clerk from the 4th of March, and that clerk actually performed the service The sixth amendment is to pay per diem to clerks to Senators and clerks to committees retained in the service of the Senate during the recess of the Fifty-first Congress under a resolution of the Senate. This amendment was rejected by the House at the short session of the Fifty-first Congress, and also at both sessions of the last Congress, so that the conferees did not feel authorized under the circumstances to agree to it.

Mr. Speaker, if no further explanation be desired, I move the adoption of the conference report as to the items agreed upon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me a Mr. CANNON of Illinois.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am in harmony with the gentleman in respect to this report; but I suggest to him whether it man in respect to this report; but I suggest to him whether it might not be well that this agreement between the House and the Senate be explained a little further.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know how it can be explained further than this: At the close of the first session of the Fifty-first Congress the Senate passed a resolution to continue the pay of Congress the Senate passed a resolution to continue the pay of Senators' clerks and per diem clerks during the vacation. An amendment to pay these clerks was put on the general deficiency bill by the Senate at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, and was rejected by the House. The same amendment was put and was rejected by the House. The same amendment was put on the general deficiency bill at both sessions of the last Con-gress and was rejected by the House.

I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will take a minute or two to make a statement a little fuller than that which the gentleman from Texas has made touching the matter of disagreement between the House and the Senate on the sixth amendment. Everything else is closed up.

I recollect very well the resolution of which the gentleman speaks. The facts are these: The long session of the Fifty-first Congress continued till about the 1st of October (that was three congress continued the about the 1st of Occober (that was three years ago), and an adjournment was then taken until the next session, giving a recess of about two months. The Senate at that time passed a resolution to pay for those two months' clerks to Senators who were not chairmen of committees. At the next session of that Congress the House would not agree to make the appropriation for those two months' pay. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] was a member of the subcommittee, of which I also as a member

Mr. SAYERS. I was not a member of the subcommittee on the deficiency bill; the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] had control of that matter, and joined in recommending the rejection of the amendment.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I remember now the gentleman from Texas was on the full committee, but not on the subcom-

The gentleman says the matter came up by way of amendment to deficiency bills once or twice in the last Congress—

Mr. SAYERS. Twice.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And was rejected by the House. I recollect that when it came up in the Fifty-first Congress I had no no very friendly feeling toward it for the reason that the House at that time had not had the courage to take pay for clerical assistance to members of the House, while the Senate had been doing that for many years. I think there was a feeling on the part of the House that we deserved pay for our clerks as much as Senators did for theirs; and I have no doubt such was the fact. At any rate, for that reason as well as others, the House refused to agree to the amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman state the other reason?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The principal reason was what I have stated. "The other reason" was, I suppose, that we did not want to pay for the two months when Congress was not in session.

Now, since that time there has been legislation under which members of the House who expend money for clerical assistance during the session are reimbursed not exceeding $100 a month to cover that expenditure, and there has been legislation also, or rather appropriations, under which clerks to individual Senators who are not chairmen of committees get $100 a month the year round. Now, this is a proposition on the part of the Senate to pay for those two months in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress when Congress was in vacation. I think it is proper also that it should be stated that the Senate seems to insist upon also that it should be stated that the Senate seems to insist upon this amendment. I might further state that we have been in the habit, both the House and the Senate, during many Congresses of appropriating extra pay for one month, sometimes two months, for employes of the House and Senate.

A MEMBER. Never two months.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, I do not want to antagonize the gentleman from Texas in the management of this bill: but I suggest to him whether it would not be well that a motion be made that the House recede from its disagreement to the Senate amendment, so as to test the sense of the House on this questate amendment, so as to test the sense of the House on this question. I will not make such a motion without the gentleman's approval. I repeat that I do not want to antagonize him in the management of his bill.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman and I agree as to this bill;

Mr. SATERS. The gentleman and I agree as to this only there is no difference whatever between us.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have said that we agree; I simply throw out the suggestion to the gentleman, because if that motion does not come now perhaps it will have to come later.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; I prefer that it should come later. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report upon the amendments to which the conferees have agreed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has submitted a conference report embracing a partial agreement of the conferees, and moves its adoption. Shall the report be adopted?

The report was adopted.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the sixth amendment of the Senate, and ask a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. SAYERS,
Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, as conferees on the part of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 2799) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit court and district courts in the State of South Dakota, in which concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 592) to extend the time for making final payments on entries under the desert-land act; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON NAVAL ORDNANCE, ETC

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 53) to remit the duties on ammunition for naval ordnance imported by the Secretary of the Navy, reported from the Committee on Ways and Means. I ask that the joint resolution be read, after which I will make a statement in reference to it.

reference to it.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remit the duties on the following-described ammunition for naval ordnance imported by the Secretary of the Navy since January 1, 1892, and now in bond at the navy-yard, New York, namely, 96 10-inch Firth armor-piercing shells. 200 6-inch, 200 8-inch, and 60 12-inch Holster armor-piercing shells, and 560 10-inch Hadfield common shells.

Mr. MCMULLIN. Under the rules of the House this should be considered in Committee of the Whole. Unless some gentleman desires it to take that course, I would ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. I desire to give every gentleman an opportunity, if he wishes it, to discuss the

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection the resolution will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, it became necessary for the Government of the United States, when our troubles arose by reason of mob violence in Chile, to purchase a certain kind of ammunition that could not be obtained here and sent there within the time that it would be needed if needed at all. The Navy Department, under the laws passed for the procurement of armor and armor plates and supplies of that kind, did make the purchases, but there was not enough of the appropriation out of which the purchases were made to pay the duties thereon. This resolution seeks simply to remit the duties on this mercial. These duties, if paid, would have to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. This is ordnance for the Navy Department of the United States, and therefore it is an idle form to go through the payment of duties under such circumstances. The Secretary of the Navy requests the passage of the resolution.

1 will ask that the letter be read, from the Secretary of the Navy, which is embodied in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means submitted the following report: The facts in the case are so fully set forth in a communication from the Secretary of the Navy to the chairman of the committee that your committee begies to copy it, with the accompanying memorandum of details from the estimates of the Bureau of Ordnance:

"NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington August, 20, 1893.

"SIR: In view of the reia ions subsisting between this Government and the government of Chile growing out of mistreatment of the crew of the U.S. Baltimore by a mob at Valparaiso in October, 1891, this Department found it necessary, early in 1892, to procure for the vessels of the Navy a larger quantity of armor-piercing shell and other, 1891, this Department found it necessary, early in 1892, to procure for the vessels of the Navy a larger quantity of armor-piercing shell and other ammunition than it was possible under any circumstances to obtain in the United States of domestic manufacture by the time within which it was expected that such ammunition might be required for active service, and in pursuance of the discretion vested in it by the acts making appropriations for orduance and ordnance store and supplies, and by the third section of the act making appropriations for the naval service, approved March 3, 1887, which provides that the material used in all naval structures provided for in said ect and the armament for the same shall be, so far as practicable, of American production and furnished and manufactured in the United States, ordered from certain European manufacturers the following described ammunition for naval ordnance, viz. ninety-six i0-inch Firth armor-piercing shell; six by 12-inch Holtzer armor-piercing shell, and sive hundred and shell; is six by 12-inch Holtzer armor-piercing shell, and sive hundred and fifty 10-inch Hadfield common shell, the orders for said shell being placed by telegraph and cable messages in January, 1892.

"I therefore inclose herewith a draft of a resolution providing for the remission of the duties on said shells, and have the honor to request that a measure be recommended by the committee for passage embodying the provisions thereof, in order that the shells in question may be distributed among those vessels of the Navy in service for which the same were proportions.

The amount involved is $43.500.

To require the payment of these duties by an apprepriation would result in unavoidable and unnecessary delay, to the embarrassment of the Navy Department, and would be so entirely a matter of bookkeeping on the part of the Government, profiting nothing, that your committee, believing the adoption of the resolution would relieve the situation, therefore recommend its passage.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I wish to ask my colleague a question. What amount of tax is remitted by this joint reso-Intion?

Mr. McMILLIN. About $43,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Another question. By whom is this duty paid, by the foreigner or by the consumer?

Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose by the consumer. That is n

Mr. McMILLIN. I suppose by the consumer. That is my idea of it. There may be some difference of opinion on that, however

Mr. REED. I am glad to see that the gentleman from Tennessee, the last one who has spoken, made the suggestion in response to his colleague that this duty was paid by the consumer with something like bated breath. It looks like there might be with someting fixe extent breach. It tooks the there ingut be some doubt in his mind on that point.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Maine need not fear that there is any doubt in my mind on that subject.

Mr. REED. That is so; ordinarily I would not.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the taxes are not paid by the consumer, it is the first occasion that has come to my knowledge where they have not been.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if no other gentleman desires to discuss this matter, I demand the previous question.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker-

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman from Maine desired heard I withdraw the demand for the previous question. If the gentleman from Maine desires to be

Mr. REED. I do not desire to make any special remarks about this, or offer any special opposition to it, because in substance it makes very little difference what is done in regard to it. The It makes very little difference what is done in regard to it. The fact that the Government obtained these materials outside is also accompanied by the further fact that they could not be obtained here, and that is one reason why I do not care particularly to make any objection to this transaction. I wish, however, it had been put in another form, namely, the form of an outright appropriation of the $43,000 for the payment of the balance due, because it seems, by inference at least, to be the law of the land that when the Government imports anything it shall pay from one Department to another, so that uniformity may be maintained

Another difficulty that seemed likely to arise was that if wo had many transactions of this sort—and I am told that there are some few others of the same kind—if we had enough of them, it might bring our own people in unfair competition with foreign people about supplying the Government with the various articles of this kind that might be needed. And whatever may be thought of the general principle of protection or free trade, there is one thing the importance of which all must recognize, that the people of the United States should be able themselves. within their own borders, to make the necessary materials for

I should have been glad, as I have said, if the bill had taken a different shape. I shall not make opposition further than this mere statement, however.

Mr. McMILLIN. The reason why it was not put in that shape was, according to the judgment of the committee, that it was wholly useless for the Government of the United States to make appropriations out of the Treasury of the United States to be appropriated by the United States back to the Treasury of the United States. United States.

Mr. REED. It is just as simple as to remit the duties in this case. It only requires an act of Congress in either case, and the $43,000, I forgot to mention, although I had it in my mind at the time, will not appear in the appropriation bills, and as there have been some very "wicked appropriations" in the last two Con-ness in the Fifty-second?

Mr. DOCKERY. No; we were left alegacy by the Fifty-first Congress, and had to make provision to meet it. We were imposed on by the legislation of the Fifty-first.

Mr. REED. Well, you were very easily imposed upon. You had control of it, and you made bigger appropriations than we ever did, and you have been going around the country ever since making excuses for it. You had better have had smaller appropriations that we have a smaller appropriation that we had smaller appropriations that we have been going and the smaller appropriations that we have the smaller appropriations that we have the smaller appropriations that we have the smaller appropriation the smaller appropriation that we have the smaller appropriation that we have the smaller appropr priations, and then perhaps you would have needed fewer ex-

Mr. DOCKERY. One hundred and fifty-four million dollars of the appropriations of the Fifty-second Congress were entailed by the legislation of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. REED. Yes; "entailed!" You were children in swaddling clothes! Things are "entailed" upon you all the time. You are going about the country from one end to the other talking about what has been entailed upon you. Why do you not do something wourselves? Why do you not do something yourselves? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I will say in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Reed] that I trust, with the House Democratic and the Senate Democratic, we will be able at this session or at the regular session of Congress to repeal some of the legislation that has imposed these extraordinary taxes upon

Mr. REED. You have not done very much repealing up to day. [Laughter on the Republican side.]
Mr. DOCKERY. We have had no opportunity heretofore.
Mr. REED. No opportunity! You have had three months.
What do you call an opportunity? You have had the House and Senate, and the President partially. [Laughter.] Why in the world do you not do something?

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. The question is on the engressment and third reading of this joint resolution. Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCK- may will be indulged in his remarks. He is helping us.

[Laughter. Mr. DOCKERY. I want to say that during this extra session Mr. Dockery did not participate in that effort to repeal a part

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentlemen from Missouri did, and desires to repeal that law, with conditions that will be just to all sections of the country.

Mr. REED. Exactly. That is what some of our good people clways want—righteousness with conditions. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMillin. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the gen-tleman from Maine [Mr. Reed] acknowledges the wickedness of some of the appropriations which he had a considerable part in imposing upon the country. I demand the previous question.
The previous question was ordered.
The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McMILLIN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order. The Clerk reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, On motion of Mr. OATES, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, with Mr. OUTHWAITE in the chair.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, the principal difficulty in obtaining a fair discussion of any bankrupt act, whatever may be its provisions, arises largely out of the prejudices created from abuses under the law of 1867.

These prejudices unfortunately have so effectually taken root in the minds of many members that the bill under consideration or any other bill that might be introduced will be met with prejudgment by many and a determination to resist any legislation on the subject, for fear that like results may follow any enactment on the subject.

Should there be any legislation on this subject of any kind at any time? If so, this Congress should feel able to act upon the question and meet it as one worthy of fair, candid, and considerate action. Are we unable to deal with the question? Ought we to feel that it should be postponed until abler men in the fu-ture occupy our places? Some say there is no necessity for it now, and therefore oppose action, choosing to wait until some great emergency may demand it, until there are more bankrupts throughout the country to avail themselves of its provisions, or until debtors have shown themselves to be more dishonest. Most of the arguments against the present bill are based on grounds generally opposed to all measures of the kind. Harsh epithets have been applied to the proposed measure and it has been denounced generally, but few have offered to substitute anything better. It is easy to criticise the work of another, but much more difficult to create and substitute anything in its place. People can be found who can criticise the Lord's Prayer, but who never offered a better prayer.

If a bankrupt act is needed, the members of this House should discuss the subject with a view of passing a bill that would accomplish what is desired under all bankrupt acts, as follows:

1. The relief of all honest but unfortunate debtors from the burden of liabilities which they can not discharge, and allow them to commence business life anew.

2. To prevent dishonest debtors from disposing of their property for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding their

3. To distribute speedily and with reasonable expense the estate of the bankrupt between his creditors to whom in justice it belongs.

I believe this House has the ability to pass such a law. If the proposed act is defective in any particular, let amendments be suggested and discussed with a view of perfecting a bill, but not blindly refuse to act. Almost every commercial nation has bank-rupt acts except our own. England has had for centuries, and it is conceded to be the greatest commercial nation of the world. They have gone on from time to time amending their bankrupt laws to meet the improved condition of the country and covering any defects which experience developed. Over two hundred amendatory acts have been passed. The fact that other nations have found bankrupt laws beneficial to the people and to the advancement of commerce should have some weight with us. The eatest statesmen of this country have time and again advocated the enactment of bankrupt acts. Clay, Webster, Hayne, Benton, and many other able statesmen in their time earnestly advocated such laws when the commercial traffic of this country was small compared with our present position as a commercial

My colleague [Mr. DALZELL] has cited the views of Mr. Webster, who so eloquently advocated the passage of a bankrupt law in 1840, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] has road to you from the works of Judge Story, giving the clear reasoning of this celebrated jurist in favor of a uniform system of bank-Also an extract from the eloquent speech of Henry Clay in the United States Senate in 1840, in favor of the passage of a uniform system of bankruptcy, and they need not be again

In 1827, when a bankrupt bill was under consideration in the United States Senate, Mr. Hayne gave the reasons for the en-actment of such a law in the most favorable terms, and I will read an extract from it, as his reasoning is as pertinent and more applicable to the situation to-day than when uttered by him on the floor of the Senate in 1827.

His views certainly ought to have weight with some gentle men who are opposing this bill. He was one of the ablest men that ever sat in the United States Senate; one of the few who was the compeer of Daniel Webster, and who could meet him in public debate on any question before that body. His views ought certainly to have weight, because they cover the conditions as they exist to-day, and apply to the situation now with greater force than when these words were uttered by Mr. Hayne. It shows how great minds differ upon subjects of this character

In discussing a bill like this, or on the same subject, after Mr. Hayne had laid down the doctrine that the framers of the Constitution imposed the obligation upon Congress to pass such a law, he said:

Hayne had laid down the doctrine that the frame'rs of the Constitution imposed the obligation upon Congress to pass such a law, he said:

Under the existing system, if system it can be called, in addition to the various and contradictory have which exist in severy State in the Union on the subject of bankerying year in solvency; in addition to the uncertainty and discussion which must always belong to any system on which twenty-divended the property of the control of the transport of

while the creditors who gave him credit when his circumstances were prosperous are constrained to witness such fraudulent conduct, and, what is worse, are condemned to endure it. By a species of easy casuistry a failing merchant persuades himself that he violates no obligation; nay, that he is giving himself new claims to the confidence of his fellow-citizens in preferring those who have trusted him when in failing circumstances over those who have fetused credit when he had ceased to deserve it.

The former he considers as his debts of honor due to those generous friends who adhered to him in adversity, while he regards the latter as mere calculating men of business, whom it is no crime to defraud. Strip the case, however, of the false garb in which its disguised, and how stands the fact. The safe and solvent man of business has given credit to one whom the control of the case, however, of the false garb in which its disguised, and how stands the fact. The safe and solvent man of business has given credit to one whom the control of the case, however, of the false garb in which its disguised, and how stands the fact. The safe and solvent man of business has given credit to one whom the control of the case, however, of the false garb in which had a solvent man of business has given credit to one whom the case of the case of the case of the case of the safe and the case of the case of

Mr. Chairman, could a stronger argument than this be made in favor of the passage of a bankrupt law at this time, and does not the argument apply now with much greater force than it did in 1827, in view of the fact that in the interval our commerce has more than trebled? I have cited this argument at length to show to gentlemen who are opposing the enactment of any bank-rupt law that they are not in accord with the great minds of the past on that subject, of the desirability of a uniform system of bankrupt laws.

Most assuredly no one here will deny the ability of these great statesmen, or that their views on the subject is not entitled to

I take the position that the Constitution imposes on Congress ae duty to pass some act on this subject. The powers of the the duty to pass some act on this subject. Federal Government as conferred by the Constitution were intended for exercise and not merely for parade. It was intended by the framers of the Constitution to confer such powers on Congress as would, if actively exercised under the Government, efficient for the advancement of the general welfare of all the people of all the States. There is an undoubted implication from the grant of the power to Congress to pass a bankrupt law that the power conferred should be called into action.

The language conferring this power, the restriction against the exercise of it by the States, prohibiting them from enacting laws impairing the obligation of contracts, the objects to be attained by it all show that it was the intention of the grantors of this power that it should be exercised. There is, in my opinion, an obligation imposed upon Congress to legislate upon the on, an obligation imposed upon Congress to legislate upon the subject. The Constitution affirms that it is desirable that some law should be passed by Congress establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

When the States yielded to the General Government the right to pass uniform laws of bankruptcy; when they consented to deny themselves the authority to pass laws impairing the obligation of contracts, did they anticipate that Congress would refuse to exercise the power conferred; would they have given up this power had they anticipated that it would never be called into exercise. The framers of the Constitution knew the benefits of such The framers of the Constitution knew the benefits of such laws which had long been in force in other comercial countries and deemed it a subject worthy of the consideration of Congress, so that any law on the subject might be uniform.

Congress has passed laws on all other subjects concerning which it was empowered to act, excepting this one. What would be the condition of this country if Congress had in the same manner declined to pass laws regulating the coining of money and the value thereof, uniform laws of naturalization, fixing the standard of weights and measures, or establishing post-offices and post-roads?

All great statesmen in discussing the provisions of former acts have conceded that it was the duty of Congress to act on the subject, and only differed as to the features of proposed legis. lation.

As to the expediency of passing an act on the subject, Mr. Mad.

The power of establishing uniform laws of bankruptcy is so intimately connected with the regulation of commerce and will prevent so many frauds when the parties or their property may lie or be removed to different states that the expediency of it seems not likely to be drawn into question.

This view of the expediency of such legislation has been time and again affirmed by the greatest statesmen of our country for almost a century

We are met in the discussion of this act by the declaration of some that it is not expedient at this time, that there is no crying necessity for it; by others that any legislation on the subject would be unwise at any time, because other acts heretofore passed have proved defective and unsatisfactory, and have been repealed after short periods of trial.

Three acts have been passed and in course of time repealed. The act of 1800 was considered too favorable to the creditor. It imposed severe penalties on bankrupts. The failure of this act arose from the inherent defects in the act; the want of ability in the officers designated to carry it into execution. The country was in its infancy, our commerce was restricted, and it was enacted and repealed in times when party spirit was at its high-It was repealed without an effort to amend its admitted defects. Since that time numerous efforts have been made to enact another. In 1827 a bill was ably discussed in the Senate, but was considered in the House to be as much too favorable to the debtor as the act of 1800 was partial to the creditor.

In 1841 an act was passed hastily to relieve those who had suffered from the panic of 1837. The act of 1867 was passed just after the close of a war which had wrecked the fortunes and prospects of thousands of persons who had formerly been successful manufacturers and traders. The act was designed principally to lift from these people burdens they could not carry, and to enable them to start business again and contribute their energy and experience toward the general welfare of the people. It was defective because of the times in which it was enacted and the little consideration its provisions received. It proved to be cumbersome, tedious, and expensive, and for these reasons the subject of abuse. Although it proved a great benefit to the whole country in the relief it afforded to thousands of honest debtors who had failed through misfortune, yet the fact that a few cases in almost every district showed that its provisions could be abused led to its repeal after eleven years' experience.

All these acts were emergency laws passed hastily, and some of them did not and could not be expected to contain the safeguards necessary to prevent abuses. It has been freely stated that there is no demand for the passage of an act at this time, nor any necessity for such law. We have been without a bankrupt act for fifteen years. For the last eight or ten years there has been a continuous and persistent demand for this legislation from the merghants, the appropriate range horsettingly satisfies. from the merchants, the manufacturers, and honest insolvents of every State. Petitions have been sent to Congress from boards of trade, mercantile and industrial associations, and men of mis-cellaneous occupations all over the country. For the last ten years legislation of this character looking to the passage of a permanent bankrupt law has been under consideration by the House of Representatives and in its Judiciary Committee and in the Senate.

The ablest men throughout the country have given it their attention, and have rendered valuable aid by making suggestions covering almost every provision of the bill. The great volume of the business of this country is transacted upon credit. Although the amount of money per capita to-day is twice as much as it was in 1860, it is not a tithe of what would be necessary to carry on the commercial transactions of the country if all business were conducted on a cash basis. No financier could accurately calculate the amount that would be required. Mr. Albert C. Stephens, editor of Bradstreet's, in a recent article in the Forum, says that 95 to 98 per cent of the wholesale business of the country is carried on by credit.

In a great manufacturing and commercial country the credit system is absolutely necessary. Every time an article of trade or commerce is sold by one and purchased by another, and not paid for in cash, a debtor and creditor are created, and sometimes more. All credit is based on confidence. The loss of confidence of the co fidence in any community is the destruction of all credit. The passage at this time of a judicious bankrupt law will go far toward restoring confidence and strengthening credit. The creditor would not be obliged to watch both debtor and his associate creditors. He would feel assured that he stood on the same footing of every other creditor, and in case of misfortune would receive his share with the rest.

The true basis of credit is the certainty that all contracts will be honestly performed. How can this be exacted except through wise laws to compel the payment of debts promptly, equally, and

The business stagnation that now pervades this country has its foundation in a want of confidence. This want of confidence has resulted largely from the failure of debtors to meet their obligations. The insufficiency of the laws to protect all creditorsalike in such times ends all credit.

From a table carefully compiled from the Bureau of Statistics I find that for the years 1879 to 1891, inclusive, there were 118,-711 failures in the United States, with liabilities to the amount of $1,804,537,732. If the years 1892 andten months of 1893 could be ascertained these figures would be enormously increased. I find for the same years there were 10,767 failures in Pennsylvania, with liabilities $176,212,624. In New York 14,987 failures, with liabilities $460,102,688; and in other States correspondingly.

Do not these figures show the necessity of some legislation on this subject?

In my opinion, a wise and judicious bankrupt act passed at this time would do more to restore confidence, to start the wheels of our factories, and give an impetus to commerce and traffic and to rekindle the fires of ambition in the breasts of honest insolvents than any other act Congress could pass. I regard it as the most important legislation before this Congress. I believe it should claim our earnest and careful consideration, and that any law we pass should avoid the defects in previous acts, and should be intended to remain permanent on the statute books.

In my opinion the difficulty in obtaining loans in many of the

In my opinion the difficulty in obtaining loans in many of the States and the high prevailing rates of interest are largely owing to the attachment and insolvent laws of these States and their liberal exemption laws. A resonable and judicious bankrulaw placing all creditors of the same class on an equal footing, and preventing unjust preferences, would have the effect of encouraging outside capital to secure investments in such States and greatly benefit manufacturers and traders in obtaining legitimate endit to ensure or business.

It has been stated that this legislation was to benefit the rich and oppress the poor. This statement is not true. Who compose the great army of debtors and creditors? They both belong to the same class of people. Who are the men who have built up the commercial business of this country? Not the millionaire, not the man who has inherited his fortune or obtained it by alliance, not the man who spends his time at Newport playing polo or clipping coupons. It takes but a small amount of brains to be a legatee or devisee, and less to inherit under intestate laws. It is the great body of energetic, active men in all branches of active business; men who have by years of toil and honest fair dealing with their fellow-men inspired their confidence and shown themselves worthy of credit; men who are willing to employ not only their means, but their crediting reat manufacturing and commercial enterprises—these are the men who have made this country a marvel in the eyes of the world. These are them en that keep the spindle humming and the wheels of the factory going. These are the men who furnish employment for the laborer and furnish bread for his family. At this time there are more than likely 150,000 of such men chained down by burdens they never can lift without relief from Congress.

Yet gentlemen who are opposing this bill say, it seems to me for the purpose of creating prejudice against it and inducing those who do not care to take the pains to examine its provisions to rejectit—those gentlemen say that if enacted into law it would be a law against the debtor and against the poor man. One gentlemen opposing this bill even said that it would be to the prejudice of the farming interest. Evidently he had never read it, because if he had he would have ascertained that it does not apply to the farmer at all in its involuntary provisions. It gives the farmer the privilege of taking advantage of its voluntary provisions, if he chooses, but the involuntary provisions of the bill apply neither to the farmer nor to the wage-worker.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to be a member of the Judichary Committee. I had the honor to be a member of that committee in the Fifty-second Congress; I do not know that I would have discussed at this time the provisions of this bill in detail at all but for the denunciations that have been heaped upon it and the announcement of the general principle that no law is needed upon this subject or should be passed. This bill has been denounced as iniquitous, it has been called pernicious, it has been called tyrannous; all the invectives that gentlemen could command have been hurled against it.

For this reason, sir, I feel that in justice to that committee, in institute to myself as a member of that committee and one who has had something to do with endeavoring fairly and faithfully to secure the passage of a just and fair bill of this kind, I ought to say something in reply to these wholesale denunciations, and to give some explanation of some of the provisions of this bill.

Perhaps there are 150,000 unfortunate people in the United States who have failed through misfortune, who extended their credit too far, who have met with reverses in their business enterprises which no human foresight could have prevented, men who have been stricken down by financial revulsions that have swept the country like a tornado.

Will you refuse to grant these people relief?
Will you withhold from the country the benefits of the energy and experience of these people?

Will you stubbornly refuse to pass any bill because you object to some of the minor provisions of the one offered? Will you not help try to pass some reasonable act of relief for

Is it right or manly to refuse to recognize the demands of the people for the enactment of some just law on the subject—not even attempt it?

I am satisfied that the greater part of the opposition which has developed against the bill has arisen from not carefully reading and understanding its provisions.

It is a lengthy bill, covering a very important subject and can one of my colleagues from Pennsylvania [Mr. Sibley], who opposed this bill, applied some very severe epithets to it; and if he is correct in his denunciation of the measure, the members of the Judiciary Committee who participated in considering and amending the bill, or in allowing it to come out of the committee, were every one of them guilty at least of laches; for a bill such as the gentleman's denunciations would show this bill to be should never have been brought into this House. leave, however, to differ from the gentleman. He started out by saving that he was no lawyer; that he was not acquainted with the forms or the phrases used by lawyers.

Now, if he had waited till he came to the end of his speech he need not have made that assertion, because anyone could have understood from the speech that such was the fact. Let us see whathe says about this bill, and as he comes from Pennsylvania, I feel it my duty to correct him, and to show him that there is on the statute books of Pennsylvania a pernicious law against which his abuse might be appropriately directed on the same subject. I refer to the old bread act of 1842. My colleague

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a very few words on this bankruptey bill. I can not speak as an attorney, for I am not familiar with the law or its forms. But I wish to speak as one who has had extensive business interests in a number of different States of the Union. I have read the bill through carefully; and if I understand the effect of its terms and phrases it should, instead of being called a bankruptcy bill, be entitled more properly "A bill to divest all debtore of hope for the future, and to prevent any debtor who may suffer from temporary embarrassment from ever securing his financial freedom." Why, Mr. Chairman, up in Pennsylvania—I say it with no disrespect—when we wish to perpetrate such an act as this bill seeks to perpetrate, we take a jinnny and a dark lantern, and we never proceed in the light of day; we take the small hours of the morning to get away with a scheme like this.

Now, the only way in which I could imagine my friend from Pennsylvania could ever use his "jimmy" and his "dark lantern" would be in trying to effect an entrance into some prison or jail in order to release from imprisonment some debtor incarcerated there under the present laws of our State. He does not know, perhaps, that throughout the State of Pennsylvania there are men imprisoned to-day waiting the time when they can be discharged by going upon the stand and swearing as to what they are worth and where their property is or give bond that they will take the benefit of the insolvent laws and turn over everything they have to some assignee, without a discharge from their debts, before they can get out of prison.

I want to read for the benefit of my colleague the act under which this can be done in the State of Pennsylvania, where it is done frequently; and when he has heard this act read, and compared its provisions with those of this proposed bankrupt law, if he does not say that our present law is "iniquitous" and that this bill is a fair measure, I will be greatly surprised.

I wish to refer to this act of 1842 and put it upon the record for the benefit of my colleague and some others who have been opposing this bill and applying harsh language to it, and spreading broadcast the charge that this bill is pernicious and iniquitous in its provisions, that it is hard upon the debtor and hard tous in its provisions, that it is nare upon the dector and hard upon the creditor. To such gentlemen I want to say that there are acts on the statute books of every State of this Union which are severe and hard upon the debtor and unjust to the creditor, and that under the provision of this proposed law the interests of both classes will be protected according to the rules of equity, It would be well to read up the statute of our own States before indulging in wholesale denunciation of proposed legislation here without sufficiently understanding it. The Pennsylvania act I refer to has been a law on the subject of fraudulent debtors for over a half century. It is as follows:

53. In all cases where, by the preceding provisions of this act, a party to a suit can not be arrested or imprisoned, it shall be lawful for the party who shall have commenced a suit, or obtained a judgment in any court of record, to apply to any judge of the court in which the suit shall have been brought, for a warrant to arrest the party against whom the suit shall have been commenced or the judgment shall have been obtained, whereupon the said judge shall require of the said party satisfactory evidence, either by the affidavit of the party making such application, or some other person or persons, that there is a debt or demand due to the party making such application from the other party in the suit or judgment, in which affidavit the nature and amount of the indebtedness shall be set forth as near as may be.

54. If the demand set forth in the affidavit be such that the party could not, according to the provisions of this act, be arrested, and if the affidavit shall establish to the satisfaction of the judge one or more of the following particulars, to wit:

That the party is about to remove any of his property out of the jurisdiction of the court in which such suit is brought with intent to defraud his creditors;

lished against the party arrested is that he is about to remove any of his property out of the jurisdiction of the court in which suit is brought with intent to defraud his creditors.

62. Such commitment shall not be granted if the person arrested shall enter into a bend to the complainant, in the penalty and with the securities prescribed in the preceding section, conditioned that he will, within thirty days, apply by petition to the court of common pleas of the county, or to judge thereof, if the court shall not within that time be in session, for the benefit of the insolvent laws of this Commonwealth, and that he will comply with all the requisitions of said law and abide all orders of the said court in that behalf; or in default thereof, and if he fail in obtaining his discharge as an insolvent debtor that he shall, on the day of his so failing, surrender himself to the jail of said county.

63. Any defendant committed agreeably to the eighth section of this act shall remain in custody until a final judgment shall have been rendered in his favor in the suit prosecuted by the creditor at whose instance he shall have been committed, or until he shall have assigned his property and obtained his discharge as provided in the subsequent sections of this act; but such person may, at any time, be discharged by any judge of the county, on his paying the debt or demand claimed and costs, or by giving the security for the payment thereof, as provided in the ninth section of this act, or on his executing either of the bonds mentioned in the tenth and eleventh section of this act.

I invite my friend to carefully consider the provisions of this Pennsylvania statute and compare them with the proposed bankrupt bill and see whether the poor debtor would not be greatly benefited in Pennsylvania by the passage of this bill.

I can cite an attachment act of the State of Texas which is in-deed "vicious and peruicious;" I can cite similar acts of many other States equally hard on the poor debtor. I affirm, that with the exception of one or two States, the States of this Union gen-erally have upon their statute books domestic attachment laws with reference to insolvency which in their provisions are harsh with respect to debtors and inequitable with respect to credit-ors. Our proposition is to enact a law with reference to debtors who become bankrupts and their creditors, which will neither be harsh to the one or inequitable to the other, but just to both of them. I could refer to a statute in the State of Texas which is harsh on the debtor and unjust to creditors.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand the gentleman to say that he can find in the statutes of Texas harsher remedies in their application to the debtor than are provided for in this bill.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not understand distinctly what the has provisions for attachments; but they state the ground of the proceeding; the ground must be sworn to, and the creditor must give a bond for the protection of the debtor in the event that he sorts to this harsh remedy without proper cause.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not wish to be interrupted at this time; but when the proper time comes I will read this statute of the State of Texas, and will make good my statements.

Mr. KILGORE. I merely wanted to say that we require a party to give bond before he can institute such a proceeding under our statute.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That is true; but the statute allows a local creditor of the State of Texas to issue an attachment against the proposed debt that is not due:

That is true.

hereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States an cently very fair measure, known as the 'Torrey bankrupt bill:' There-

"Resolved, That we respectfully petition our United States Senators and members of the National House of Representatives to vote for the passage of the Torrey bill.

"Resolved, That the secretary of the Dauphin County Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, the largest farmers' organization in said county, be instructed to mail a copy of this action, with seal attached, to our Senators and members of Congress."

I suppose it has also escaped his attention that this bill has been editorially considered and approved by the National Economist, which is one of the leading papers which advocates the principles of that union. I will read it for the benefit of the House:

THE TORREY RANKRUPT BILL.

The Federal Constitution contains a provision which reserves to Congress the right to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies. By it the States are forbidden to impair the obligations of contracts. The result is that Congress can, and the States can not, pass a comprehensive bankrupt

Inw.

The Torrey bankrupt bill is conceded on all hands to be a perfectly fair and comprehensive measure. On the one hand, it provides that suits in bankruptcy may be instituted by a debtor against himself when he wishes to take the benefits of the act; and, on the other, that such suits may be commenced by a debtor's creditors upon the grounds, in general terms, that he has been guilty of fraudulent acts, or has become insolvent and can not pay such debts as have been liquidated. Proceedings in bankruptcy could not be prosecuted with effect against a man who was simply indebted on the property of table on a contract.

not be prosecuted with elect against a man who was simply indeseed on open-account, or liable on a contract.

In all cases there will be a fair trial, and the defendant may have a jury, if he desires, to determine the facts in the case.

A bankrupt, who is in general terms an honest man, and has surrendered his property, over and above the exemptions allowed by his State, to his creditors for pro rata distribution to those of the same class, will receive a discharge.

his property, over and above the exemptions allowed by his state, to his creditors for pro rata distribution to those of the same class, will receive a discharge.

The cost of bankruptey proceedings are very small; that is, as compared with other proceedings. There is a small filing fee to be paid in each case, but it will not be required from a voluntary bankrupt who does not have, and can not procure, the money with which to pay the amount.

Creditors, under the provisions of this bill, will not be permitted to take advantage of one another, as they now do, by securing preferences, either voluntary or by attachment, but will be required in all cases to take in full settlement their pro rata part of the estate.

The bill in all of its details is a fair measure, and is of uniform application, and is hence designed to do great good in the best interests of honest people in all parts of the country.

Every Populist in the House, and every member in sympathy with the objects of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, is in sympathy with this measure. This fact its significant, and is evidence that it has been found to be a companion piece to all of the reforms which the union advocates.—The National Economist.

The president and the members of the executive committee of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union have all expressed intelligent and well-considered opinions as to this bill. One of these gentlemen, Col. H. C. Demming is, I am glad to say, a prominent and influential citizen of my State. an article from the Evening News of this city containing interviews with these gentlemen, as follows:

BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION—VIEWS OF PROMINENT ALLIANCE MEN ON THIS QUESTION—THIS SENTIMENT STRONGLY IN FAVOR OF A NATIONAL BANKRUPTCY LAW—THE TORREY BILL WOULD PROVE A BLESSING TO THE PEO-

Your correspondent to-day called upon the executive committee of the Farmers' Ailiance and Industrial Union, now in session in this city, to ascertain the views of the members on the subject of national bankruptcy legislation, with results as follows:

Mr. H. L. Loucks, president of the National Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, said:

"I have always believed in the policy of a comprehensive, equitable ruptcy law, as provided by the Federal Constitution at the time of its adoption. The present is, I think, an auspicious time for legislation by Congress upon that subject. I do not, of course, speak for the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, but only as an individual. Our union is permoting many reforms calculated to benefit the people; these benefits will, of course, only accurate for the future.

ing, perhaps, to the creditor in another State—property which may lie in the store in bulk as received from that creditor?

Mr. KILGORE. That is true, but he can not get a judgment on his debt until it is due.

Mr. WOLVERTON. No, but he has got the property, and after the property is gone what remains for any other creditor? This bill does not give the creditorea right to have the property of the debter seized before the adjudication until a bond has been given.

Now, I suppose my friend Mr. SIBLEY was not aware when he used this hareh language against this pending measure, that it had received the indorsement of the Dauphin County Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, and that it will in every respect promote the best interests of the grangers and the people whom he specially represents and poses for in this House. For the purpose of informing him, I read from the resolutions that were adopted at Harrisburg on the 28th day of January, 1893, by this body:

DAUPHIN COUNTY FARMERS' ALLIANCE AND INDUSTRIAL UNION.

Harrisburg, Fa. January 98, 1893.

At a meeting of the Dauphin County Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, on the above date, there was unanimously passed resolutions as follows:

fees, nevertheless the court shall be open to him. The bill contemplates fair dealing on all hands, i.e., the debtor is to turn over his property, over and above his State exemptions, to a trustee and get a discharge, if he is honest. The creditors who have secured valid liens will have them enforced, and the unsecured creditors will receive a pro rata of their claims quickly and at small cost. small cost. This subject has not been considered by our National Union, but is certainly an appropriate companion to the reforms which we demand."

Col. H. C. Demming, of Harrisburg, Pa., secretary of the executive committee of the National Farmers' Alliance Industrial Union, said:

"The Torrey bankruptcy bill provides that every person, except a corporation, may go into voluntary bankruptcy. That provision, of course, includes farmers and the industrial classes generally. It provides that suits in bankruptcy can not be brought against those chiefly engaged in farming, or the tiliage of the soil, or wage-earners. I am satisfied that these provisions will prove satisfactory to the members of the Farmers' Alliance and industrial Union, and that they will be individually benefited by the enactment and administration of such a law. If the suballiances of our organization would consider and pass upon the subject, and forward their Senators and Congressman the conclusions reached by them, it would greatly enhance the probability of favorable action by Congress upon the bill. It has been pending for several sessions, has been considered in and out of Congress, and has been indorsed by bodies of almost every sort and description all over the country, and, therefore, there does not seem to be any good reason why it should not be enacted for the benefit of the whole people. There may be can hereafter be adjusted by supplement."

Mr. L. Leonard said:

"My views upon this subject are of course simply the expression of an individual opinion, and are not claimed to in any way stand as an expression of any official action. Under most of the existing State laws no provisions whatever are made for the discharge of an honest unfortunate who has surrendered all his property and has been left with debts hanging over him; in those States where such provisions are made the discharge of the contry, because of the carristance of the bankruptey bill which has received pretty nearly the unannous approval of the bankruptey bill which has

Again, my learned friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] says:

I do not think I am in a condition at present to suffer in that way; but I now that for many years of my business experience there was not an hour when some malicious, evil-disposed person could not under a bill of this kind ave forced me into bankruptcy.

I am too charitable to believe that my friend has been as bad as he represents himself. Under this bill there would have been only ten reasons which could have been assigned by anybody to have put him into bankruptoy.

First. Concealing himself, departed or remained away from his place of business, residence or domicil with intent to avoid civil process and defeat his creditors.

Surely he never was guilty of this.

Second. Failed for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under due process of law for $600, etc.

He certainly would not have us believe that he was insolvent for many years.

Third. Transferred his property with intent to defraud his creditors.

Surely he would not come under this head.

Fourth. Made an assignment or admitted his inability to pay his debts.

Nor this.

Fifth. Made, while insolvent, a gambling contract.

Surely this would not apply to him.

Sixth. While insolvent, transferred his property, or suffered it to be levied upon for the purpose of giving a preference.

Was he ever guilty of this?

Seventh. Procured a judgment to be entered against him to defeat his creditors; secreted his property to avoid being levied upon to defeat his creditors.

Ninth. While insolvent, suffering an execution for $500 or over to be returned nulle bond.

Tenth. While insolvent, allow paper to remain under protest for thirty days aggregating $500.

Surely my friend was guilty of none of these offences, yet he denounces this bill with the statement that for the many years of his business experience there was not an hour during which he could not have been thrown into bankruptcy.

I am of the opinion that if he had been "familiar with the law or its forms" he would have came to a very different conclusion. Again, it was suggested by my learned friend from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], for whom and whose opinions I have the highest regard on questions of law, that this was a political measure. I fear that my learned friend is of that class so well described by Judge Story in the citation which was read by Col. OATES of Alabama, who have become so wedded to their own laws—the laws of his own State—that he refuses to act on general laws upon bankruptey for the whole country for fear they would repeal or make ineffective the local laws of his own State. peal or make ineffective the local laws of his own State. Now, it seems to me it was very unfair for my friend to try to throw odium upon this as a political measure. It is not a political measure in any respect or aspect whatever. It is the first suggestion of the kind I have ever heard in that direction in committee or out of committee, or anywhere else

The Judiciary Committee has never divided on party lines in considering this subject. The same is true of the subcommittees of that body which have considered the bill. The Judiciary Comof that body which have considered the bill. The Judiciary Committee of the Fifty-first Congress, which contained a majority of Republicans, reported the bill favorably. The Judiciary Committee of the Fifty-second Congress, which was composed of a majority of Democrats, reported it favorably. The Judiciary Committee of the present Congress, which has a majority of Democrate reported the bill without amendment. In the Fifty Committee of the present Congress, which has a majority of Democrats, reported the bill without amendment. In the Fifty first Congress the bill was supported upon the floor of the House by prominent members of the Democratic party, as follows: Messrs. WILLIAM L. WILSON, of West Virginia; THOMAS C. CATCHINGS, of Mississippi; Littleton W. Moore, of Texas; JOSEPH H. OUTHWAITE, of Ohio; William McAdoo, of New Jersey, and WALTER I. HAYES, of Iowa. On the other side it was sey, and WALTER I. HAYES, of Iowa. B. Taylor, of Ohio; sey, and WALTER I. HAYES, of flows. On the other side it was supported by gentlemen as follows: Messrs. E. B. Taylor, of Ohio; James Buchanan, of New Jersey; Bishop W. Perkins, of Kansas; George E. Adams, of Illinois, and Nathan Frank, of Missouri. If we believe the gentlemen who have so stated that his is a Republican measure, we are confronted with the proposition that upon its first appearance here it was supported upon the floor by six of the leading Democrats of the House and by five Republicans.

I have never heard it asserted that there were any politics in I have never heard it asserted that there were any politics in a uniform system of bankruptcy. The gentleman alleged that there is, for some reason. Is it because the bill originated in the Fifty-first Congress, or was there first presented, and is it to be treated for that reason as the outgrowth of Republican principles or as a Republican measure? I ask, What politics can be found in it? Were there no members amongst those who constituted the "National Convention of the Representatives of stituted the "National Convention of the Representatives of Commercial Bodies" which considered and promulgated the bill, who were Democrats? Is there any line to be drawn through trade or commerce which can distinguish a Democrat from a Republican? I fear it was for the purpose of bringing down on the bill obloquy and odium, and induce people to vote against it as a political measure who otherwise upon fair consideration of the purpose as a political measure who otherwise upon fair consideration of its provisions would be inclined to support it, or make an effort to perfect a bill of this character so that it might be properly enacted by Congress. And he said with a good deal of ridicule and sarcasm in his tones that this bill is an "old citizen."

Well, Mr. Speaker, an old citizen very often is better than a new one; and on this subject of bankruptcy or the drafting of a bankrupt bill, I assure you too much attention can not be given to it by the best and ablest lawyers; and the fact that it has been before the House three, four, or five times or more; that it has been considered by different judiciary committees; that it has been considered in the Senate and the House, and that it once been considered in the Senate and the House, and that it once passed the House, ought not to detract from its utility or make it unpopular, because any man who will consider the matter must recognize the need of some such legislation. "Mr. Torrey," he he says, "is the author;" that it still bears the name of "Torrey." Mr. Torrey has not done anything in connection with the passage of this act, or in conference with any of its members of this or any previous Congress which has detracted from his character as a reputable man; he is universally spoken of by both the friends and opponents of the bill as an earnest, considerate, and able adversage of the cause he represents. and able advocate of the cause he represents.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania really think, as the opponents seem to, that if it was fully established that this bill was to be known as the Torrey bankruptcy bill, that that ought to be sufficient to defeat it?

bill, that that ought to be sufficient to defeat it?

Mr. WOLVERTON. No, sir; it does not matter what you call the bill. The question before the House, and the only question is, is it fair, is it just, is it an honest bill, calculated to accomplish the purposes intended? The principal objection to Mr. Torrey seems to be that he is a first-class lawyer. Is it a crime to be a lawyer? I regard it as the highest and the noblest and most honorable profession. If lawyers are criminals the Judiciary Committee is a pack of criminals, and the chairman is the chief. [Laughter.] It is no crime to be a lawyer.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] on yesterday seemed to be so anxious to establish the fact that this bill remains the Torrey bill, that I was laboring under that this bill remains the Torrey bill, that I was laboring under the impression that he seems to think there is something in that name which would render it improper for members to support the bill after that fact was established. Mr. WOLVERTON. The attempt evidently was by referring to the authorship and supporters of the bill to make it unpopular before this House, and to prevent a fair consideration of its suggest that if the author of this bill was an obscure man and its supporters were unknown and few in number, that the present opponents would object to it on that ground, although a meritorious measure. Since the bill by its provisions and their arrangement speak a volume as to the ability of its author and arrangement speak a volume as to the ability of its author and as it has been indorsed by all classes of people from one end of the country to the other, the opponents have seen fit to try to detract from its merits by abuse of its author and supporters. Mind you, it is not alleged or pretended that a single unfair, inconsiderate, or dishonest thing has been done in connection with or in behalf of this measure. It is simply stated in loud tones that a lawyer drafted it and that rich wholesale dealers support it. Let us examine these allegations and see whether they are true and whether any member ought to ignore its provisions and let his vote be controlled by the history of the bill outside of Congress.

The National Convention of the Representatives of the Commercial Bodies of the United States held its first sesions in St. Louis in the spring of 1889, and its second session in Minneapolis in the fall of the same year. It promulgated this measure as the "Torrey bunkruptey bill." The officers and chairmen of committees of that organization are as follows: President, Jay L. Torrey (a lawyer), St. Louis; secretary, James T. Wyman (a dealer in sash, doors, and blinds), Minneapolis; assistant secretary, Cinton A. Snowden (the general manager of a newspaper). tary, Clinton A. Snowden (the general manager of a newspaper), Tacoma, Wash.; treasurer, Peter Nicholson (the president of a bank), St. Louis. The chrimmen of the committees are; Presidential. Hon. George W. Stone (the chief justice of the supreme court of Alabama), Montgomery; Congressional, Lowe Emerson (a carriage manufacturer), Cincinnati; finance, William T. Baker (a commission man and ex-president of the board of directors of the World's Fair), Chicago; bankruptcy literature, Breedlove Smith (an insurance man), New Orleans; executive, William E. Schweppe (a wholesale grocer), St. Louis.

The formation of this organization in public for the promotion of the public good was not wrongful, but commendable. The organizers and promoters of this body realized the necessity of a bankruptcy law, and they evidently foresaw the difficulties of securing action by Congress, and hence went about the matter in a perfectly straightforward and laudable way. Our long delay in taking action upon the subject has justified all they have done. It appears that only about 5 per cent of the members are wholesalers; the other 95 per cent are engaged in all of the occupations and pursuits known to our people. tary, Clinton A. Snowden (the general manager of a newspaper),

The members of the House will be pleased, I am sure, to know the extent to which this measure has been considered and to learn the names of the large number of bodies and petitioners who have indorsed it, and who the officers and committeemen of this national organization are. I will accordingly submit the

One would think, from what has been said by the opposition, that this act was conceived and drafted and was being pressed only by the wholesale dealers. In point of fact, the principal op-position outside of Congress that comes to the enactment of this law is from a few of the largest wholesale dealers of this country, who are able to take care of themselves. The reasons for their opposition is ably stated in an interview with Mr. J. K. Burnham, which I submit.

ham, which I submit.

It has been said by one of my colleagues from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] that there is no demand for this legislation at this time. I want to say that the leading newspapers in the State of Pennsylvania, irrespective of party politics, have supported not only general legislation on the subject of bankruptcy, but the Torrey bill. Petitions have been sent here from the state of the state o citizens from all over the State, as will be seen by the list I have submitted. Even Texas has largely petitioned for the passage of this law, and its leading newspapers are in favor of it.

I will insert and have printed clippings from some of the principal papers of these States, showing that there is a persistent demand for this legislation.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Are you not surprised, considering the great effort that has been made to pass this bill, and to get petitions for it, that the petitions are not a great deal more numerous than they are? Mr. WOLVERTON. In answer to the gentleman's question I would say that if he will take the pains to examine the petitions that are on file here and in the Senate, he will find there never was a bill brought before this House or the Senate of the United States which has been so extensively petitioned for from his own

State and from every other State in this Union, as this bill. There are more petitions and resolutions in favor of this bill from more people—people representing more brains, industry, and enterprise—than have ever been presented in behalf of any other public measure before Congress.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow he another question?
Mr. WOLVERTON. Certainly.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. So far as my own city is concerned, I say without fear of successful contradiction that no periods. tition was ever obtained, except at the tail end of a canvass. There is no spontaneous desire for a bankruptcy law, and I will take my chances in opposing it here, knowing that I represent the real desire of my constituents. It is an easy matter toget up petitions. You can get a petition signed by one-half of the peo-ple of the country for the hanging of the other half, if it is well presented.

presented.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That is a declaration which, if believed, would do away with the efficacy of all petitions. The gentleman says, "Have there been any petitions in favor of this bill?" and when I say to him that there have been a great many, and from his district, his reply is that petitions can be gotten up to hang people. If it is true in Pittsburg that they pay no more attention to the papers they sign than that, then petitions from that city would be worthless. I can not believe that his statement is true.

This bill has been favorably passed upon by the American Association of Flint and Lime Glass Manufacturers. I note that among its members are a large number of prominent and prosperous firms from the city of Pittsburg. I submit its action, as

AMERICAN ASSOCIATION OF FLINT AND LIME GLASS MANUFACTURERS.

Whereas this body heretofore appointed a delegate to the National Bankruptcy Convention, held at Minneapolis, for the purpose of formulating and securing the enactment by Congress of a national bankrupt law; and Whereas the convention held at Minneapolis has formulated and sent to this body a copy of the bankrupt bill, known as the Torrey bill, as a result of their labors; and,

Be it further resolved, That this body does hereby assert, most emphatically and unreservedly, that our great interstate commerce and the credit system which underlies, and, to a great extent supports the same, requires and deserves the full protection which will be afforded them by the enaction and the honest though unfortunite debtor, and which will be economical and speedy in its operations, while tending to prevent, discourage, and punish commercial fraud, and will, if enacted, remedy existing abuses, neglects, and great losses now sustained by reason of discriminating and conflicting State insolvent laws.

Be it further resolved, That the officers of the association are hereby instructed to prepare and transmit a copy of the foregoing to Congress from our association, urging the passage of the Torrey bill at the coming session, and that as individuals we urge it upon our respective Representatives in Congress.

This same organization happened to be in session during the consideration of this bill in the Fifty-first Congress, and then sent an urgent telegram asking for the passage of the bill.

A large number of bodies in my State have considered the subject and reported their conclusions at length. The Philadelphia Royal of Trade has collected their configuration to the classical state.

delphia Board of Trade has called attention to the alarming increase of the liabilities of those who fail under the State enactments; its action to which I refer was as follows:

[Memorial to the Senate from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, at its fifty eighth annual meeting.]

PHILADELPHIA, PA., January 26, 1891.

To the Senate of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, respectfully petitions you to immediately consider and pass the Torrey bankrupt bill, for reasons as follows:

a. The number of commercial failures for the whole country is increasing from year to year, and the amount of the liabilities of those who fall is for each year largely in excess of the preceding year. For your information facts are submitted as follows:

Table of commercial failures

[As reported by Messrs. R. G. Dun & Co., for the years 1888 to 1890, inclusive.]

Years.	No. of failures.	Liabilities.	Excess of liabilities over preceding year.
1888 1880	10,670 10,882 10,907	8123, 829, 973 148, 784, 337 159, 856, 964	824, 954, 364 41, 072, 627

This showing must give rise to great apprehension as to what the future will bring to the commercial interests of the country.

2. As a result of the failure of Congress for eleven years to enact a bankrupt law, there are to-day hundreds of thousands of honest men who are plodding their weary way as best they can under burdens of indebtedness which they can not and never will be able to pay. The hanging over them of this cloud of indebtedness militates against a sound public policy, interferes with their exercising the rights of citizenship in the highest and best sense, and prevents them from adequately supporting their families and deducating their children, all to no advantage to their respective creditors.

2. Four national conventions have been held since the repeal of the old bankrupt law for the sole purpose of securing the enactment of a new one. The last of them promulgated the Torroy bill, and it has since been indorsed by hundreds of commercial bodies in the several States of the Union and petitioned for by hundreds of thousands of citizens, without regard to their residences, occupations, or political convictions. These facts indicate conclusively that the honest progressive men of this country, those who honestly labor for the perpetuation of a commerce founded upon the rules of integrity, are weary of the present condition of the laws, which begot recklessness and want of care on the part of those engaged in business, the giving and receiving of preferences, the execution and enforcement of secret judgments, and the perpetuation of fraud and chicanery in its multifarnious forms. They further bear testimony that these same men desire a uniform law, as contemplated by the Constitution, which will produce more conservative business methods, enable debtors and creditors to confer together for nutual advantage without the fear of the institution of compulsory processes, and in the event of commercial failures, equitable, prompt, and editentage.

In ylew of all which, conclusions are reached as follows:

discharge.

In view of all which, conclusions are reached as follows:

1. Resolved, That in the opinion of this board there is but one way to check the increase of commercial failures, diminish the amount of liabilities in volved therein, and restore and maintain confidence, and that is for Congress to pass a law embracing both the voluntary and involuntary systems of bankruptcy, to supersede the incomplete and varying laws of the several States.

2. Resolved further, That this board believes that honest insolvents should be discharged from their debts, under such carefully guarded provisions of law as would prevent the extension of like privileges to dishonest men.

3. Resolved further, That this board respectfully submits that the Torrey bankrupt bill, involving as it does the property rights of every man, woman, and child in the whole country and the rights of every honest insolvent man to a discharge, is the most important measure now pending before your body and should therefore be immediately considered, to the exclusion of all other business.

4. Resolved further, That the officers of this board are hereby instructed to inform the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State of the above action, and to carnestly urge them to use their utmost influence to have the Torrey bill passed before the adjournment of Congress on March 4 next.

A true copy from the records.

FRED. FRALEY, President Philadelphia Board of Trade.

W. R. TUCKER, Secretary.

One of the great privileges still left to the people is the right to petition to Congress to make known their wants in the only way open to them. This has always been considered a sacred way open to them. This has always been considered a sacred right. Their petitions should be respected—not sneered at—and should have great weight on subjects which are so intimately connected with their prosperity as these which affect credit and

Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], whom I have long and favorably known, made a speech on this bill, criticising it very severely. I propose to take up the gentleman's criticisms and to show him and the members of the House wherein he has erred as to the provisions of the bill and the results which will follow from its enactment.

I feel that it is due me, that it is due to this committee, to show this House that this is notan "iniquitous" but a just bill. Why should members blindly and sullenly refuse to consider the bill? If it does not suit those gentlemen who are opposing it, and who seem to be criticising it for the purpose of killing it, let them, as they have ability, come forward and try to amend it; we want a good bill, not a bad one; if this one is faulty let us try to correct it. It is unquestionably the best bill ever presented to Congress on this subject, but if it can be improved its friends are not only on this subject, but it should be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I move that my colleague be allowed to complete his remarks.

colleague be allowed to complete his remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I thank my colleague for his kindness.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] gave as a reason why we should not enact a bankruptcy law that a similar measure in England has been from time to time amended. He shows, in referring to the subject, that England has never been without such a law upon the statute books since the "act of 34 and 35 Henry VIII, c 4." (1542.)

It is true that this law, like other laws of England, and nearly all of the laws, without exception, in this country has been from time to time amended as experience suggested. I respectfully submit, therefore, that the course of legislation upon this subject in England, instead of furnishing a precedent why we subject in England, instead of furnishing a precedent why we should not enact such a law, furnishes uncontrovertible proof that we should, without delay, enact such a law and hereafter from time to time amend and improve it just as the English nation has done.

I challenge the proposition that the law of 1867 was unpopular with the people because of its harshness to the unfortunate bank-rupt as alleged, and submit that the reasons for its unpopularity was because of its being so amended that the fees of bankruptcy officers were excessive, and the delays in its administration tedious and unbearable, coupled with the fact that in the South it was administered by a lot of irresponsible carpetbag judges who brought the United States courts into contempt with the people.

I respectfully dissent from the statement that-All bankrupt laws have at all times been unpopular with the great m people, and have soon been repealed or modified after their enactme

This is the only first-class country which has not at this time,

This is the only first-class country which has not at this time, and which has not had for many years consecutively upon its statute books, a bankruptcy law. It has been found in practice to be as essential to have a commercial probate law for the administration of the assets of bankrupts as to have a probate law for the administration of the assets of deceased persons.

The reasons why the bankruptcy laws in the United States have been repealed are that they have been, without exception, enacted after times of commercial distress, and have been for the purpose simply of relieving the victims of such distress and were not wisely conceived as fair and impartial laws. The bill we are vocate has been framed in view of the experiences under similar vocate has been framed in view of the experiences under similar laws in this and other countries, and does not contain the provisions which have resulted in the repeal of the former laws, but on the contrary is a perfectly fair and impartial measure to both debtors and creditors.

The gentleman certainly can not maintain his assertion that-A bankrupt law should never be passed in anticipation of business depression. Its effect is to hasten and bring on such a condition.

This bill is so conditioned as to prevent creditors from taking advantage of the debtor; to prevent creditors from taking advantage of each other; to prevent the debtor from taking advantage of his creditor; and to secure the honest debtor in the event of bankruptcy the exemptions allowed him by the laws of the State in which he lives, and a discharge from his debts, and to his creditors a pro rata part of his estate quickly and at small cost. It follows that confidence will be given both to debtors and creditors as to their property rights, and the rigors of business. ness depression will be greatly relieved by the maintenance of

Because we have in this country forty-four States is not a valid reason why we should not also have one uniform system relid reason why we should not also have one uniform system of bankruptcy, as was contemplated by the Constitution. The fact that we have so many States, and that their laws upon this subject are diverse, is one of the strongest reasons why we should have a national law, as contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. If this power thus reserved to Congress had been wisely exercised in the beginning and a law enacted applicable to our then conditions, and had been amended from to time to time to keep pace with our national development, such a thing as a State insolvency law would never have been dreamed of; but as Congress failed in the early days of the Government to act, and then on three different occasions put upon the statute books an emergency rather than a permanent law, the result was that the States were forced, because of the necessity for legislation upon this subject, to enact these insolvency laws; their existence, therefore, constitutes an aggressive demand for action by Congress, and the fact that we have the forty-four rarying systems constitutes a most potent argument for the enactment of one uniform law to succeed them.

The reference of the gentleman [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] to the disadvantages of forced sales of property in a community would seem to imply that he is unconscious of the fact that forced sales of property are occurring from day to day all over the country under the imperfect laws now in force, and that these laws are very much more expensive and very much more hurtful than they would be under the proposed law; more expensive and the proposed law. pensive, because failures are more frequent now than they would be then; more hurtful, because under the present imperfect State laws they can not be so carefully conducted with reference to the best interests of those concerned, and for the purpose of making the property bring its full market value.

It is a source of common regret that business complications result in failures, that imperfections of moral character result in dishonest acts of debtors, and that in consequence of these two facts judgments are entered against debtors and in favor of creditors, and that the courts of justice in the ordinary course endeavor to secure a satisfaction of these judgments. Since these conditions exist our endeavor is to so far as possible prevent them, and in case they occur to provide a simple, expeditious, and inexpensive method of securing the discharge of the honest debtor and a compromise or the distribution of the estate to those to whom it belongs. Such is the purpose and only pur-

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. William A. Stone] seems to entertain views diametrically opposed to his associates who are endeavoring to defeat this bill. He says:

A bankrupt law can only work good to the persons who are thereby relieved of their debts. It is for them and them alone. It can only work injury to the trade and to the public.

Other gentlemen on the same side of the controversy have maintained with great vehemence that a law is not demanded at all by the debtor class, but that it is a wicked scheme on behalf of creditors to oppress debtors. As a matter of fact, the enactment of this law is demanded by all classes in all parts of the country. A few great houses have, I am informed, opposed, and are still opposing the enactment of this measure, but the great mass of all business concerns, so far as I know, are in favor of it.

The gentleman whose remarks are under consideration said: The involuntary provisions allow creditors to force a debtor into bank ruptcy against his will.

This statement is not accurate except in the sense that you might say that the creditors of any debtor may obtain judgments against him.

If a debtor should commit an act of bankruptcy under this bill his creditors might, under very careful restrictions, institute proceedings against him; the debtor would have his day in court, and a jury trial, if desired, and if it transpired that he had committed the act of bankruptcy complained of would be adjudged a bankrupt; yet if under similar circumstances the creditors, or anyone of them, should proceed against the common debtor, and judgment should be obtained against him, the reoults would be much more disastrous to his financial interests than they possibly could be under the proposed law.

I only take up the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] because he was trying to array sentimentagainst the bill. He has the ability to do so. I take up these vere criticisms which he chose to make against it for the purpose of illustrating the provisions of this bill, and I can show that my learned friend was incorrect in almost every proposition; and I suppose that arose from the fact of insufficient time to give it proper examination. He said:

Various acts are set down in the bill as acts of bankruptcy. I need not enumerate them. Some are authorized by the laws of the States, thereby bringing a conflict between the laws of the States and the United States.

The gentleman certainly does not mean to say that acts of bankruptcy are prescribed by the laws of the States since the power to do so was expressly reserved to Congress by the Federal Constitution, yet all of the States have enacted laws pursuant to which creditors may proceed against debtors, and by which, under certain circumstances, they may have writs of attachment; but it can not be fairly said that this proposed law will come in conflict with those laws.

The casual listener to the remarks by those who have opposed the bill would, no doubt, conclude that debtors were an entirely privileged class within the districts represented by these gentlemen, and that this bill was a radical innovation upon their rights.

As a matter of fact, anyone who is a creditor of any debtor, or thinks he is, living anywhere in the United States, may go into court and bring a suit to determine his rights. Mind you, this is anyone who has, or imagines he has, a claim against the person whom he sues. If his claim is founded upon a note, he may institute suit on the very day on which it becomes due and not be compelled to wait, as he is under the bankruptey law, for thirty days; he may bring a suit by himself without being com-pelled to secure the assistance and copperation of two other creditors where there are twelve or more creditors of such debtor; he may bring his suit without reference to the amount of his claim instead of being required to have an unsecured claim for $500 or over; he may proceed, although he has ample security for his claim, which he could not do under the bill; he may sue because of default on an open account, which he can not do under the proposed law; after instituting his suit he is entitled, as a matter of right, to a trial in the ordinary course. In such suit there may be continuances and delays just as there might be in the bankruptcy suits; but sooner or later the time will come when he will be entitled, if he prevailed in his action, to a judgment, under the proposed law the plaintiffs may never obtain judgment, because it is the privilege of the defendant, after suit is brought and before a trial is had, to come into court and offer a compromised settlement; i. e., secure addi-tional time to pay the already due amounts or a reduction of the amount due with or without security or any other form of settlement which the debtor may wish to make and which the creditors are willing to accept.

If in the ordinary suit the creditor has obtained final judg-ment, he is entitled to an execution, and under it the property of the defendant must be levied upon and sold; there is no escape from this result; if it happens that the levy is made in times of depression or of financial distress, the property will, of course, be sacrificed; if the debtor has amounts due to him, his debtors will be garnisheed and compelled to come into court and answer as to whether or not they are indebted, and if so, how much, and when it will be due, and whether they have property of the defendant, and if so, what and how much; this process is of special hardship to the debtors of country mer-chants since they may be garnisheed by every creditor who may institute proceedings and will thereby be compelled to come to court and answer; this is true, although it may transpire that the amounts which are owing by them are not and will not be due for a long period of time. The condition of the same debtor whose misfortunes I have just described, in the ordinary course under present laws, would be very much less rigorous under the proposed law. This fol-lows from the fact that subsequent to the adjudication his property would be taken possession of by the trustee appointed by the creditors, and be administered not under a sheriff's flag, but according to the rules of equity; he would be permitted to retain the exemptions allowed by the laws of his State, and in the event he was an honest man would receive an absolute discharge from his debts and be permitted to again prosecute with-out restraint the occupation of his choosing. If the defendant in this bankruptcy proceeding happened to be a country merchant having large outstandings, his debtors would not be compelled to respond to garnishments as in other cases, but would be required to settle with the trustee in accord-ance with the contract entered into between them and the debtor; if it happened that such contract was that the debt should be paid at the end of the year or upon a given contingency, the trustee would be entitled to collect it then, but not until then; if the debtor wished to contest a claim represented by the trustee, he would have an opportunity to do it in the same courts and in the same manner as he would have had an opportunity to do had not bankruptcy proceedings intervened; if there was a reason why the case should be compromised rather than litigated, this end could be accomplished under the proposed bankruptcy law. The condition of a vicious creditor under the proposed bankruptcy law is not so good as it is under the present State laws, because under the former his hand is stayed, while under the latter he has full sway in the ordinary course. The position of the creditor who insists upon realizing, irrespective of the rights of other creditors or the financial interests of the debtor, the full amount of his claim will not be so advantageous under the proposed law as it is under the laws of the State, where it is permissible for the creditor who first secures a writ of attachment to realize on his claim in full, because, under the provisions of the bill, he will only be entitled to his pro rata portion of the common debtor's estate; he may insist under present laws upon the common debtor's estate; he may insist under present laws upon the payment of every farthing of his claim, but under the bill, if a compromise should be agreed upon and approved by the court, he would be compelled to accept just what the other creditors accepted; nothing more, nothing less.

The position of the fair-minded creditor will be better under the hardward law them under the bardward law them the present State levels.

the bankruptcy law than under the present State laws; because, while he now sometimes comes first and sometimes comes last in the struggle against the debtor and the other creditors, he will, under the proposed law in every case receive his pro rata part of the debtor's estate quickly and at small cost.

The statement is therefore made that the position of the unfortunate honest debtor and of the creditors as a whole will be better in every stage of litigation under the proposed law than it is now under the laws of the States

The present State laws will not be interferred with so far as they are invoked as between those who are solvent or those who have not committed acts of bankruptcy. Statistics compiled by the Treasury Department from the annual sheets of the mercantile agencies show that for fourteen years the annual failcantile agencies show that for fourteen years the annual fair ures among those engaged in business has not exceeded 1.07 per cent per annum. This percentage includes all of the failures under the present imperfect laws. It is confidently anticipated that under the proposed law the percentage will be even smaller; the result, therefore, will be that this proposed law, against which the opponents are inveighing, will not be the rule for the guidance of all of the people in the technical sense, but will apply only to the administration or extinement of the but will apply only to the administration or settlement of the affairs of less than 2 per cent of those engaged in business.

The gentleman who opened the debate, in opposition to the bill [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], further said:

The great majority of all business in this country is done on credit. If it was reduced to a cash basis the country would be greatly crip; led: yet under this bill no man would be justified in incurring a debt, as he might be forced into bankruptcy if he was unable to meet it.

This gentleman was never more mistaken in his life than in making this statement. He is right in saying, in the latter part of it, that the majority of the business of this country is done on credit. He is right in saying that if the business of this country was reduced to a cash basis the country would be greatly crippled. One of the greatest and most beneficial results to be obtained by bill will be to aid the conducting of business on credit by making credit more secure and to prevent the crippling of the country by reducing the conducting of the business to a cash

The panic of this year has illustrated how dreadful it is, in a financial sense, to curtail the credit of the country. It is confidently believed that the enactment of this bill will greatly lessen the probability or possibility of the recurrence of any such con-ditions. One of the characteristics of all of the speeches in opposition to the bill has been that they have contained vehement statements that the bill is calculated to do great injury to the people of the country. These statements have not been supported either by statistics, the provisions of the bill, or by argu-

The gentleman whose remarks are under review took occasion to say:

The bill is in the interest of the creditor, the involuntary part of it. It is skillfully drawn—so skillful that it will be extremely difficult to keep out of bankruptey.

A man in the ordinary course of business will be liable to tumble in at any time, wholly unaware that he was at all in danger.

Let us test the accuracy of this statement by the provisions of the bill.

The first ground of bankruptcy is:

(1) Concealed himself, departed, or remained away from his place of business, residence, or domicile with the intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors.

It is a ground of attachment in most of the States that a debtor should perpetrate this act for the purpose of avoiding the service of civil process. This bill makes it also necessary that such avoidance should be for the purpose of defeating his creditors. By the dictionary clause the first section of the bill, the word "defeat" shall include "defraud, delay, evade, hinder, and impede." I do not think that it can be reasonably said that an honest man will "tumble (into bankruptcy) at any time wholly unaware" because of the commission of this act of bankruptcy. The second ground upon which proceedings may be instituted in bankruptcy against a debtor is that he has

(2) Failed for thirty days while insolvent to secure release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale, and until the petition is filed.

If the property of a solvent person should be levied upon and he should fail within the time limited to have it released, it he should fall within the time limited to have it released, it would not constitute an act of bankruptey, but if he is insolvent, it would be an act of bankruptey, and the creditors, under very careful restrictions, might if they saw fit institute proceedings; they would not institute proceedings unless it was for the necessary protection of their interests any more than they would pursue a like course in any other case. For the purpose of illustrating let me superce a sea in which it seems to exthat the the ing, let me suppose a case in which it seems to me that the ends of justice would be defeated unless this provision shall be retained in the bill.

A man who is in debt has become insolvent; he is not willing to retain his exemptions, secure a discharge, and have the property in excess of his exemptions ratably distributed among his creditors, but on the contrary he wishes to have his entire property taken by an insolvent relative or friend who will secretly hold it for him; in order to carry out such a purpose he would perform an act which would be a ground of attachment which would be known first and only to the relative or friend; an attach ment would follow and in the ordinary course the entire property would be sacrificed, and the proceeds carried away; would any member of this House want such a result as I have illustrated consummated under a law enacted by Congress? One of the chief purposes of the bankruptcy law is to secure the ratable and equitable distribution of the estates of bankrupts. In order to carry out this object we must, therefore, insert in the bill such provisions as will prevent the estate from being carried away by fraudulent or favored claimants. It therefore seems to me that this provision can not work a hardship to any honest man, and that it is necessary to the perfection of the bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The gentleman does not mean to assert that under the attachment laws of a State the whole property of a debtor can be taken under an attachment suit for the collection of one debt?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I mean to say that when the debt is large enough to cover the whole of his property they can attach the whole of the property.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That seldom occurs.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It does occur. It has occurred in my State recently under the most iniquitous use of the laws of the State of Pennsylvania now in force. Goods in the whole package, that were ordered within thirty days before from New York, were seized to pay the debt of another, which was collusive. Now, if you can have a large debt, a debt large enough, or collusion, it would take the whole property. It is immaterial whether the whole property is absorbed by one claim or a number of them so long as there are other claims of equal merits which are not even paid in part.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me aquestion just there. I understood him to say that within the past ninety days there had occurred a case in his State where a party had ordered goods from New York, and while the goods were still in the original package there had been a collusive attachment. I ask the gentleman from Penn-sylvania if it is not the law in his State that in such a case the purchase can be vacated and the goods reclaimed?

Mr. WOLVERTON. It could under the laws of the State.

Mr. BAILEY. Then why did not the parties do that? Mr. WOLVERTON. Under the attachment laws of Pennsylvania, on this collusive arrangement, where the creditor lives in New York and the debtor lives in Texas or in Pennsylvania, in six days it can be swept out of existence. The remedy under our laws is inadequate in such a case.

Mr. BAILEY. Apart from the collusion, if the purchase was made upon a misrepresentation of the solvency of the purchaser, the courts all hold that no title has passed, and the purchaser, chase can be vacated and the goods reclaimed.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That may be the law in Texas. In Pennsylvania we could indict him for obtaining goods under false pretense

Mr. BAILEY. We could go into his storehouse and take the

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have seen, and every lawyer has seen, most gross injustice done to creditors through the connivance of debtors with some favored creditor and perhaps with some collusive creditor.

The third ground upon which proceedings may be instituted is that a person has-

(3) Made a transfer of any of his property with the intent to defeat his

You will remember the word "defeat" shall include "defraud, delay, evade. hinder, and impede." If there is any gentleman upon the floor of the House who objects to a debtor being proceeded against who has transferred any of his property for these pur-poses, so far as I am concerned, he is welcome to oppose the bill. The fourth act of bankruptcy is that a person has

(4) Made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in court a ritten statement admitting his inability to pay his debts.

If a debtor should perform either one of these acts it would constitute an act of bankruptcy, and his creditors might if they saw fit institute proceedings; it would not be incumbent upon them to do so. If they wished the administration to occur pursuant to the provisions of law under which the assignment was made, it would proceed in that way, but if such a number of them as are required to file a petition preferred to have the administration under this uniform law, it would be their privilege to have proceeding in bankruptcy begun.

The purpose of the proposed law, so far as the estate is con-cerned, is to prevent preferences and secure its ratable distri-bution; this purpose could be entirely defeated unless the bill contained this provision with reference to assignments. If there was no such provision in the bill and I was a debtor and wished to favor my relatives or friends, or to have my property hidden away and lived in a State where preferences were permitted, I away and fived in a State where presented were printing, would simply make my arrangements and then my assignment, and then laugh both at my creditors and the Congressmen who thus legislated under the Constitution. Certainly the debtor could not complain since under the law he would be entitled to his exemptions, and, if honest, to a discharge.

Certainly the creditors could not complain since they would Certainly the creditors could not complain since they would secure a prompt and inexpensive administration under a law of Congress enacted pursuant to a power reserved to it in the Federal Constitution at the time of its adoption. As to both of these grounds it will be noted that they are not complete unit the debtor has either signed the assignment or the statement of insolvency. It can not be doubted but what in either event his affairs should be taken in hand by a representative of the credit of th itors rather than his personal representative and his estate be distributed.

The fifth act of bankruptcy is that a person had-

(5) Made while insolvent a contract personally, or by agent, for the purchase or sale of a commodity with the intent not to receive or deliver the same, but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and market price thereof, and at a time subsequent to the making of such contract.

This provision covers the case of an insolvent debtor gambling in futures, which has been criticised because it was alleged to establish a different rule for gambling in options for rich men and poor men. It will not interfere, and ought not, in my judgment, to interfere with the business of solvent persons; but it will, and I think it ought to interfere with the man who has become insolvent, and who is gambling and thereby running a risk on the balance of his estate instead of having it distributed pro rata among his creditors, if they so elect. The sixth ground upon which proceedings may be instituted is that a person has-

(6) Made, while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law or otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference.

Please note that this applies only to a person who is insolvent. In this connection I quote from another part of the bill so that you may comprehend the full meaning of the words "for the

you may comprehend the full meaning of the words "for the purpose of giving a preference."

It is provided by section 60 of the bill as follows:

A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, he has procured or suffered alugement to be entered against himself in favor of any person or made a transfer of any of his property with intent to (1) defeat the operation of this act; (2) enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class.

If a bankrupt shall have given a preference within four months before the filing of a petition, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person.

This proposition of the hill is intended to prevent the defeat of

This provision of the bill is intended to prevent the defeat of justice. It will not, in any way, or to any extent, interfere with the ordinary and legitimate transaction of business. If a debtor is attempting to make away with his property in contemplation of bankruptcy, it will stop it, and eventuate in the equitable distribution of the estate. I respectfully submit that in that event the result proposed to be obtained is that which should be desired by all honest men.

sired by all honest men.

Mr. RAY. Why is it any more dangerous to his creditors for an involvent man to gamble than it is for a solvent man?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I should say, in answer to that, that a good deal would depend upon the ability of the man to shuffle cards. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY. It would depend on that, and on how long his gambles lessed, and on how much he could afford to lose, would it bling lasted, and on how much he could afford to lose, would it

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes; but if he is insolvent, he can not afford to lose anything, because an insolvent man is one who has not enough property to pay his debts, and what he has left he ought not to gamble with, because it belongs to his creditors, in equity at least.

Mr. RAY. But he might gain enough from his gambling operations to pay all his debts. [Laughter.] Now, is it not true that when a solvent man gambles in anything or in any way he endangers his creditors.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It is true, I think, as a general rule, that whether a man is solvent or insolvent, it is dangerous for him to gamble. Mr. RAY. Mr. RAY. And many a solvent man has in that way lost his money or his property and cheated his creditors?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAY. Now, if we are going to strike at gambling at all in this bill, why not strike at it boldly and square y and prohibit gambling by the solvent man as well as the insolvent?

Mr. WOLVERTON. My answer is that this is not an act to prevent gambling; and while it is true that it is dangerous for a solvent or for an insolvent man to gamble, and that gambling on the part of a solvent man begin the his insolvent was the solvent or the solvent man to gamble, and that gambling the solvent man to gamble, and the solvent man to gamble the solvent man on the part of a solvent man may led to his insolvency, yet this bill can not properly do more than provide that a man who has not enough to pay his debts has no right to gamble in futures to not enough to pay his debts has no right to gamble in futures to the injury of his creditors.

Mr. RAY. He endangers his creditors by gambling. In the section of this bill which defines acts of bankruptcy, you say that if a man conceals himself or avoids service of process, he has committed an act of bankruptcy. Why is that an act of bankruptcy? Simply because the man is supposed thereby to endanger his creditors. As the bill now stands, it is not necessary that he shall be actually insolvent. He may be insolvent, but if he does any of the acts have enumerated and to which I just rehe does any of the acts here enumerated, and to which I just referred, and which you say endanger his creditors, you propose to put him into bankruptoy solvent or insolvent, and you say that is right and just. Now, if it is right and just to put a man into bankruptoy because he avoids the service of process in one particular case, when he is entirely solvent, why not put him into bankruptcy if he endangers his creditors by gambling in any way or manner?

Mr. WOLVERTON. There is a vast difference between gam-Mr.WOLVERTON. There is a vast difference between gambling and concealing one's self or running out of the jurisdiction of court to escape service of process. A man who will conceal himself to avoid a legitimate process of the court being served upon him is an anarchist. He is opposed to all law.

Mr. RAY. You do not claim that if a man should conceal himself to avoid service of process he would be an anarchist?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I speak of a man who runs away from the ordinary process of the courts.

Mr. RAY. But there might be a case where the man would do it innocently.

it innocently.

Mr. WOLVERTON. There could not be many such cases.

Mr. RAY. A man might desire to have a little time to get the money to pay up, and in the meantime he might dodge service of process. Now, in this bill as reported you go to the extent of saying that if a man does that he is committing an act of bankruptcy, which may be taken advantage of by any of his creditors at any time six months thereafter, even though he may have returned and read that the transfer of the say in th at any time six months thereafter, even though he may have returned and paid that particular debt and surrendered himself to the process of the court.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That is a long question, and is rather more an argument than a question.

Mr. RAY. I know it is an argument, but I wanted to bring these two provisions of the bill together.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I can not see the resemblance between gambling and avoiding service of judicial process. answer to the gentleman's question, let me suppose that a man should conceal himself from his creditors, or should avoid the service of judicial process in order to let a friend's judgment ripen so that he could issue execution upon that judgment and sweep up his property and prevent the other creditors from getting service upon him and coming upon his property.

Mr. RAY. I would not approve that, of course: but I want to return to the line of argument which you were pursuing when I asked you a question.

Mr. WOLVERTON. In relation to gambling?

Mr. RAY. Yes, sir. Dealing in options or futures, which is a species of gambling. Now, if you put a man into bankruptcy for an act of that kind you do it, I suppose, upon the theory that the act endangers the rights of his creditors. But if you hold that, why not go a step further and say that if a man, being insolvent, plays cards for money, he also shall be thrown into bankruptcy.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not know but what it would be a good addition to this section. The gentleman may know more good addition to this section. The gentleman may know more about cards than I do and about the danger of playing them, and if he thinks that provision is necessary for the protection of a man's creditors, I am willing to accept the amendment.

[Laughter.] Mr. RAY. Mr. RAY. I do not know anything about gambling; I have never played cards for money, but I have "hearn tell" about it [laughter]; and I suppose that when a person who is insolvent goes into a gambling house and risks his money on a game of cards it is just as dangerous to his creditors as if he goes into nee of these "exchanges" or into Wall street and risks his money on a chance game of "futures" and "options." I can see no distinction between the two cases. Therefore I say if we go to the extent of providing against one kind of company in this bill I extent of providing against one kind of gaming in this bill I think we ought to go further and include the other.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Suppose a man wins at the game.

Mr. RAY. Then it is all for the benefit of his creditors, of

Now I oppose this provision in regard to "futures" and "options" upon principle; and I do not believe it should have a place in a bankruptcy bill. That is why I oppose it—not because I am in favor of that kind of dealing at all, but because I believe any provision of this kind detracts from the force of a bankruptcy bill. But if we retain the provision I am now discussing, then I can not see any reason why we should not put in a further provision against other kinds of gambling. All I desire to elicit

I can not see any reason why we should not put in a further provision against other kinds of gambling. All I desire to elicit from the gentleman now addressing the House is his reason (if he has any good reason) for including the one and not the other. Mr. WOLVERTON. My reason is that the law is not intended to apply to an honest solvent man. You can not put a man into bankruptcy unless he is dishonest, has failed, or become insolvent and not paid his debts.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman does not catch the point to which I am order verify to direct his attention.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman does not ca I am endeavoring to direct his attention.

Am endeavoring to direct his attention.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I think I do.

Mr. RAY. No; here is the point: Suppose an insolvent man deals in "futures" or "options;" now, you say that shall be regarded as an act of bankruptoy.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Why? Because he is insolvent.

Mr. RAY. Very good. Now, suppose an insolvent man goes into a gambling house, and is accustomed to do so—

A MEMBER. He is the only kind of a man that ought to go there.

Mr. RAY. Unfortunately that is not the only kind of men who do go there. Now, as I was saying, an insolvent man goes into a gambling house and risks his money on a game of cards-$100 or $500 or any other sum; and he is in the habit of doing this. Sometimes he wins and sometimes he loses. Now, why this. Sometimes he wins and sometimes he loses. Now, why not make this an act of bankruptcy as well as gambling upon "futures" or "options?" Why put the one in and not the other? That is the point I would like the gentleman to elucidate.

Mr. WOLVERTON. A millionaire is not a bankrupt simply because he plays a game of cards.

Mr. RAY. No; but I am putting the case of a man who is insolvent when he goes into a gambling house and plays cards

Mr. COCKRAN. How could be play if he were insolvent?
Mr. RAY. Why, sir, many a man who is insolvent has his pockets full of money.

A MEMBER. Somebody else's money.

Mr. WOLVERTON. The money which ought to be divided among his creditors.

Mr. RAY. It is getting to be quite customary in these times for the men who carry the most money in their pockets or about their persons and who do the least work not to pay their honest debts.

Mr. COCKRAN. May I ask where that custom prevails?

Mr. RAY. In New York City to quite an extent.

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. RAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. As a lawyer he must be perfectly conversant with the fact that all through the State of New York, as well as in other States, it is quite customary for men to become, as they say, insolvent, unable to pay their debts, and they put their property into the hands of their wives, or relatives, or friends, and still they go about, dressed in purple and fine linen, riding in carriages and cutting a great swell, although they do not pay anything that they owe. Now, that is one of the reasons why I favor the passage of a properly framed bankrupt law, to render that sort of thing impossible. Occurrences of that kind do take place, as we know.

Mr. COCKRAN. Is there anything in the bill that prevents that?

Mr. RAY. Yes, if it becomes a law. Mr. WOLVERTON. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to

Mr. RAY. Certainly. I had no intention of interrupting my friend, but simply to get this explanation.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have had no experience in dealing in futures or gambling at the table. I know that a man who is solvent has a right to do nearly anything that he pleases, except to commit crime; since his money is his own he can apply it as to commit crime; since his money is his own he can apply it as he pleases. But when a man is insolvent and has not enough to pay me my honest debt and pay others what he owes he has no business to go into the gaming house, where the invariable rule is to lose, and gamble away money or property.

Mr. RAY. Why not put him into bankruptcy?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not see any objection to doing so. I should say that under those circumstances his property should be notable distributed among his anglitans.

be ratably distributed among his creditors.

I will continue to show the errors into which my colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] has fallen.

The seventh ground for proceeding is that a person has-(7) Procured or suffered a judgment to be entered again intent to defeat his creditors.

You will, of course, remember that "defeat" shall include "defraud, delay, evade, hinder, and impede." Under the laws of many of the States judgments are obtained for these various Under the laws purposes, and I regret to say that the frauds are consummated in this way with impunity. For my part, I have a greater con-tempt and loathing for frauds which are committed under the forms of laws than for those which are committed in violation of the law. This provision of the bill is intended to maintain the integrity of justice, and to prevent judgments from being en-forced which are not bonafides. If any gentleman upon the floor wishes to oppose the bill because of this provision he is welcome to do so, so far as I am concerned.

The eighth ground upon which proceedings may be instituted

is that a person has

(8) Secreted any of his property to avoid it being levied upon under legal rocess against himself and to defeat his creditors.

In considering this ground please keep in mind the meaning of the word "defeat." Hiding of the property is not of infrequent occurrence in many of the States as a means of defeating the process of the courts. I know and every member of the House knows that the only effective means of fighting anarchy to the states and to enable them to have their process. is to uphold the courts and to enable them to have their proces served. The debtor who undertakes to thwart the service of the process of the courts and the ordinary administration of justice in them is, in my judgment, one of the worst enemies of society. I therefore think that any debtor who is guilty of such acts ought to be amenable to the process of the bankruptcy court, and in case the allegation is fairly proven, I think his estate ought to be administered.

The ninth ground is that a person has-

(9) Suffered, while insolvent, an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself, to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed.

This provision has been criticised in the course of the debate because it was alleged that there was no occasion to put a man into bankruptcy where, upon execution, no property could be found. Those who have made this criticism are evidently unaware that under the laws of some of the States real estate can not be sold under an execution, and that a man against whom a judgment has been obtained might own large tracts of land and yet an execution issued upon such judgment would be returned "No property found."

Such criticisms are evidently made with a forgetfulness of the fact that a fradulently-inclined debtor not infrequently removes his property out of the jurisdiction within which the execution might be served or converts it into cash, and hides the cash, and that, as a result, the execution proves unavailing. It must. therefore, be apparent to the mind of every gentleman that this ground is necessarily a part of the bill.

The tenth and final ground for action on the part of creditors

is that a person has-

(10) Suspended and not resumed for thirty days, and until a petition is filed while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $500 or over.

You will observe that the person, firm, or corporation who might suffer its paper to go to protest and remain in protest for thirty days and until a petition was filed, must be one which is insolvent, or they will not be liable to be adjudged a bankrupt. Under the present laws of all the States a person may be sued immediately after going to protest, and irrespective of the amount of the paper and irrespective of the solvency or insolvence. ency of the maker. It therefore can not be said to constitue any hardship that a person who owes on commercial paper to the amount stated, and who is insolvent and who does not within thirty days and until the petition is filed resume the payment of it, may be proceeded against in bankruptcy. Under the old law the time, as I remember it, was fourteen days, and there was no provision that the person in default should be insolvent. I did not hear, in the course of my practice under that law, nor have I heard it contended in the whole course of the agitation in behalf of a bankrupt law nor in debates on this bill, that any hardships were suffered under the old law on this ground.

I invite the attention of every member of the House, and espe cially do I insist that the opponents of this bill shall note, that it is not a round for the institution of bankruptcy proceedings that an amount due upon open account has not been paid; that an undetermined amount due under a contract has not been paid; on the contrary, it is necessary that the defendant shall have done or suffered to be done some act which is designed to defraud his creditors or some of them, or that he has in writing admitted his inability to conduct his own affairs, to pay his own debts, or has defended against a proceeding and a judgment against him, or that in writing he has promised to pay a stated amount. In view of all which, I submit that I have conclusively shown that it will not "be extremely difficult to keep out of bank-ruptcy," and that no "man in the ordinary course of business ruptoy," and that no "man in the ordinary course or business will be liable to tumble in at any time, wholly unaware that he was at all in danger," as was stated by the gentleman whose remarks are in question.

The member from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] is reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as having said:

The lawyers who live at the places where the United States court sit will have a monopoly of the bankrupt practice, and those lawyers who attend to the general practice and their clients will be at their mercy.

The reply to this statement is, first, that it is incorrect; and, second, that if it were true, still it would not be any reason why a bankruptcy law should not be passed if it would prove in practice for the best interests of the whole people. The fact that the law, if passed, will be a national one makes it necessary that it should be enforced by the Federal courts, since it has been held that the Government can not force a State court to exercise jurisdiction under a Federal law. If it were attempted to administer a national law in the State courts the ends of justice might be entirely defeated by the refusal of the State courts to act; we might, therefore, have presented to us the spectacle of a part of the courts acting and a part not, or of a part acting sometimes and in some cases and at other times refusing in other cases to act

It must therefore, in the best interests of all parties, be enforced in the United States courts. The inconvenience to parties in interest from having the law administered in the United States courts has been, in my judgment, greatly overestimated by the opponents of the bill. As a matter of fact, the Federal courts hold sessions for the most part at all of the places where there is a sufficient amount of business to in any sense justify it.

It may be fairly said of any part of the country where a United States court is not held within a reasonable distance, that such part of the country is sparsely settled and that there is little occasion for holding court there; it also, of course, follows that in any sparsely settled country there will be very little bank-ruptcy business to be transacted. The inconvenience of living where courts are never held is also experienced in a greater or less degree under present State laws, and is always one of the inconveniences which the pioneers in any country voluntarily

In order to bring the administration of the law as near to every man's door as possible, it has been provided by the bill that the meeting of creditors shall be held at the county seat of the county where the bankrupt resides, unless it would be manifestly inconvenient to the creditors; that referees to whom cases for administration may be referred by the court may be appointed without limit as to number, and that such territorial districts may be assigned to them as may be desirable; that claims against estates may be proven by the simpleaffidavit of the claimant, and that they will be allowed as of course upon being filed in court, or before the referee, or sent to either by mail, and that evidence in bankruptcy cases may be taken in the form of depositions under the provisions of law now in force or which may be hereafter enacted upon this subject.

These provisions, and possibly others which do not occur to me at this moment, have been made in the bill in order to prevent anything in the line of hardships which might possibly occur in anything in the line of hardships which might possibly occur in the administration of it. In addition, it is provided that litigation with regard to the property interests of the estate shall be brought in the court which would have had jurisdiction of the controversy had not bankruptcy proceedings intervened. That is to say, if A has a claim against B, and A is put into bankruptcy the trustee of A, in the event litigation is necessary and they are both citizens of the same State, must sue B in the State

If they were residents of different States, and the claim was such a one as the United States circuit court would have jurisdiction of, the suit may be brought in the proper United States circuit court. But the trustee of A could not, under any circuit court. cumstances, bring sult in the bankruptcy court and compel B to come in and litigate his rights in that tribunal unless it should be by the consent of B. Thus it will be seen that the objection concerning which so much has been said, and regarding which so much opposition has been found to the enactment of the bill, is reduced to the minimum if not entirely done away with by an explanation of the very careful provisions which have been made in the bill upon this subject.

It is a notorious fact among business men and lawyers cognizant of the facts of the case that the collection business of the country has for a series of years become less and less, until at the present time there is very little of it by comparison with what it formerly was. This fact grows out of the condition of the laws. For example, if a number of claims against a debtor are put into the hands of a lawyer for collection it usually results in an attachment being issued against the debtor, or of his making some form of voluntary assignment, or of being put into the hands of a receiver; and this, too, irrespective of whether the claims are just or unjust, and irrespective of whether he is solvent or insolvent. In other words, the great majority of the debtors of the country are not sufficiently strong financially to defend themselves against claims which they believe to be un-just, because even the bringing of a suit against them is likely to alarm other creditors and result in their being forced to the wall financially.

If this bill should be passed, then the conditions will be en-tirely different in this, that if claims are put in the hands of lawyers for collection against a debtor, he will be able to defend against them if he desires, since in the event his creditors become alarmed, he may secure a meeting of them and explain fully and frankly his actual conditions, since this law will prevent them from taking advantage of one another by entering into a struggle to see who can first secure a lien against his property.

It follows therefore that the passage of the bill will, instead of resulting in the consolidation of the legal commercial business of the country, result in its revival and of its being transacted the parties live.

As before stated, the percentage of failures among those who are engaged in business for the whole country does not exceed a little over I per cent per annum, and has not done so for years, up to the present year at least, and if therefore it were true, as it is not, that all of this business would be concentrated to the places of the meeting of the bankruptcy courts, still it would not materially interfere or affect the ordinary legal business of the country; and besides, if it did, this point ought not to be considered since every lawyer of standing would consider first, the best financial interests of his client before considering what effect it would have on his legal practice.

It was stated that-

The application may be made at any time after two months from the date of the adjudication in bankruptcy.

This is not all of the provision. It is that-

A person, not a corporation, may, after the expiration of two months and within the next four months subsequent to being adjudged a bankrupt, file an application for a discharge in the court of bankruptcy in which the proceedings are pending; if it shall be made to appear to the judge that the bankrupt was unavoidably prevented from alling it within such time, it may be filed within, but not after the expiration of the next six months.

This limitation of the time within which the application may be filed is to prevent a fraudulent bankrupt from making application for a discharge after the death or removal of witnesses from the jurisdiction of the court. In other words, it is that when persons who can not obtain their discharges when all of the facts surrounding their failure can be proved in order to receive them, they can not do so at some subsequent time.

The speaker criticises the use of the word "material" as applied to the false statement which would prevent a bankrupt from receiving a discharge. He also criticises the word "substantial" as modifying the word "valuation" with reference to the amount of accounts concerning which there was a misrepsentation. These words were used in order that the bankrupt should not be refused a discharge unless the false statement complained of was material. In other words, he should not be denied relief because he made a false statement of no importance. In the same manner the word "substantial" is used with reference to the amount of claims which might be inserted in the schedule or omitted from it, since it was not desired that an amount of no importance should be taken cognizance of. The criticism seems to have been made in a spirit indicating a de-sire that we should be more considerate of the debtors rights than we have been, but I respectfully submit that in the provisions of the bill we have been more considerate than it is the wish of the gentleman we should be.

Complaint is made that there is a provision to prevent a discharge where the application is "with fraudulent intent or neglect charge where the application is "with fraudulent intent or neglect to keep books of account or records from which his true condition might be ascertained," accompanied by the statement that there are a great many people in business who do not keep such accounts or records. I know, of course, that there are a great many people who do business without keeping formal sets of books, but in view of the practice, universally I believe, of exchanging bills, of conducting correspondence, of securing insurance, of making returns for taxes, and of other details connected with business, I think there are always records from which the financial condition of the denter may be ascertained axthe financial condition of the deptor may be ascertained, except where as a part of a deliberate design such records have been destroyed or have not been made, with a wrongful intent.

In all events it seems to me reasonable that those who ask for this great privilege under the law should be only such persons as shall be able to stand this very reasonable and lenient test as to the good faith with which they have conducted their business affairs which has resulted in their unfortunate financial condition, and which has necessitated an application for their dis-

It is stated asfollo ws:

Under the act of 1867 the bankrupt could not obtain a discharge unless the assets equaled 30 per cent of the debts proved against his estate, or on the assent of one-fourth in number or one-third in value of his creditors. No such requisition is necessary under this bill; it is a matter wholly and solely with the judge. The creditors have nothing to do with it.

This statement is made as a criticism of this bill, and as going to show that the act of 1867 was a better measure than this one

The provision with regard to the payment of 30 per cent of the debts proven did not apply in the act of 1867 to all bank-rupts as this statement would seem to imply, but only to those who were voluntary bankrupts. As to the policy of requiring the payment of any percentage as a condition precedent to the discharge of a bankrupt, I have this to say: The discharge of a debtor from the just claims of his creditor can be justified only upon the ground that it is required by a sound public policy. A sound public policy has nothing to do with the question as to whather any argument is paid by the debtor's extraction as to whether any amount is paid by the debtor's estate, or, if so, the exact amount paid. It simply goes to the extent of saying that where an honest man has made a fair surrender of his property he shall be discharged from the further claim of the creditor.

The same reasoning which justifies the passage of exemption laws by the several States justifies the passage of a law for the discharge of the honest bankrupt. Imagine an exemption law by the terms of which a debtor was to have a bed for his family and the implements of trade for himself, only upon condition that he could pay, say 30 per cent of the amount he owed. should a law be passed giving to a bankrupt a discharge whos estate paid 30 cents, and refuse it to a bankrupt whose estate only paid 29.99 cents; why should a bankrupt be discharged whose misfortune has only amounted to the reduction of 70 cent of his estate, and refused to a bankrupt whose entire estate has been destroyed by a devastating flood or a disastrous cyclone.

Clone.

The only ground upon which a discharge may be granted by the authority of a law of the United States and decree of a court after hearing, is that of a sound public policy. This being true, why should there be a condition-precedent added that the dictates of a sound public policy shall be withheld unless the debtor shall have been able to beg or coerce a certain per cent of his creditors to consent that he shall have a discharge? I have heard it said that under the old law creditors not infrequently withheld their consent to discharges until paid a finanquently withheld their consent to discharges until paid a financial consideration to give it. Does any gentleman think that speculation upon such a basis is justified? I would not be will-ing to advocate a law under which such a species of speculation would be possible.

My conclusion, therefore, upon this question is that those who are entitled to the consideration of the law are only honest men, and that they are entitled to it without reference to the extent or character of their misfortune, and without reference to the good nature or malicious feelings of their creditors. It was urged by the same member of this House as an objection to the passage of this bill with at least apparent frankness,

The judge shall discharge unless the bankrupt shall have done one of five things, and, as an involuntary bankrupt, he must have done at least one of these things; and as the judge has in adjudicating him a bankrupt already passed upon that question, I see no way in which an involuntary bankrupt can ever be discharged.

This gentleman, mind you, made the opening argument in opposition to the bill; lest you may not have gotten the full force of the statement which I have just quoted, let me read it to you

The judge shall discharge unless the bankrupt shall have done one of five things, and, as an involuntary bankrupt, he must have done at least one of these things; and as the judge has in adjudicating him a bankrupt already passed upon that question, I see no way in which an involuntary bankrupt can ever be discharged.

I submit this statement as fairly in line with most of the statements which have been made so freely in opposition to this measure. I do not question the sincerity of the gentleman making it, but I do submit that if I shall show that he is entirely mistaken in so important a point as this, it will be but a reasonable conclusion that he is entirely mistaken in his other statements which are calculated to throw discredit upon the bill

Let me read you the pertinent parts of the bill so that you can see by a comparison that this error is flagrant.

Section 2, a, is as follows:

SEC. 2. a Acts of bankruptcy.—Acts of bankruptcy by a person shall consist of his having within six months prior to the filing of a petition against him (i) concealed himself, departed or remained away from his plac of business, residence, or domicile continuously with intent to avoid the service of civil process and to defeat his creditors—

Meanwhile he may have created a preference-

Meanwhile he may have created a preference—

(2) failed for thirty days while insolvent to secure the release of any property levied upon under process of law for $500 or over, or if such property is to be sold under such process then until three days before the time fixed for such sale and until a petition is filed; (3) made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his creditors; (4) made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors or filed in courta written statement admitting his inability to pay his debts; (5) made while insolvent a contract personally, or by agent, for the purchase or sale of a commodity with intent not to receive or deliver the same but merely to receive or pay a difference between the contract and the market price thereof, at a time subsequent to the making of such contract; (6) made while insolvent, a transfer of any of his property or suffered any of it to be taken or levied upon by process of law otherwise for the purpose of giving a preference; (7) procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself with intent to defeat his creditors; (8) secreted any of his property to avoid its being levied upon under legal process against himself which intent to defeat his creditors; (8) suffered while insolvent an execution for $500 or over, or a number of executions aggregating such amount, against himself to be returned no property found, unless the amount shown to be due by such executions shall be paid before a petition is filed, or (10) suspended and not resumed for thirty days and until a petition is filed, while insolvent, the payment of his commercial paper for or aggregating $600 or over.

Section 13, a and b, is as follows:

Section 13, a and b, is as follows:

Sec. 13. a Discharges, when granted.—A person, not a corporation, may after the expiration of two months and within the next four months subsequent to being adjudged a bankrupt, file an application for a discharge in the court of bankruptcy in which the proceedings are pending; if it shall be made to appear to the judge that the bankrupt was unavoidably prevented from filing it within such time, it may be filed within but not after the expiration of the next six months.

• The judge shall hear the application for a discharge, and such pleas as may be made in opposition thereto by parties in interest, at such time as his convenience will permit and as will give parties in interest, at such time as his convenience will permit and as will give parties in interest a reasonable opportunity to be heard, and discharge the applicant unless he has (1) committed an offense punishable by imprisonment or fine as herein provided: (2) given a preference as herein defined, under anassignment for the benefit of creditors or otherwise, which has not been surrendered to the trustee; (3) knowingly made a materially false statement in writing concerning nish financial condition to any person for the purpose of obtaining credit or of being communicated to the trade or to those from whom he has sought or obtained credit; (4) made a transfer of any of his property which any creditor, who has proved his debt in the proceedings, might, at the time of the bankruptcy, have impeached as fraudulent if he had then been a judgment creditor, unless such property shall have been surrendered to the trustee; or (5) with fraudulent intent destroyed or neglected to keep books of account or records from which his true condition might be ascertained.

Section 29, a, referred to in subdivision (1) in the section on discharges as above, is as follows:

Section 29, d, referred to in subdivision (1) in the section on discharges as above, is as follows:

Sec. 20. a Offenses.—A person shall be punished, by imprisonment for a period not to exceed ten years, upon conviction of the offense of having willifully (1) appropriated to his own use, embezzled, spent, or unlawfully transferred any property belonging to a bankrupt estate which came into his charge as trustee; (2) attempted to account or accounted for any of his property, or attempted to account or accounted while a bankrupt for any of the property belonging to his estate by fictitious losses or expenses; (3) concealed while a bankrupt, or after his discharge, from his trustee any of the property belonging to his estate; (4) in case of any person having to his knowledge, after he has become a bankrupt, proved a false claim against his estate, falled to disclose that fact, within one month after coming to a knowledge thereof, to his trustee; (5) made a false oath in, or in relation to, any proceeding in bankruptcy; (6) made a substantially false valuation, as a bankrupt, or any of the property of his estate in his schedule of property or omitted therefrom any of the property of his estate, or from the list of his creditors any person to whom he is indebted in a substantial amount, or included therein any person to whom he is not indebted, or included therein a creditor for an amount substantially more than the true indebted-ness; (7) obtained on credit any property with intent not to pay for the same or with intent to use the same to prefer a creditor or increase his property in contemplation of bankruptcy; (8) presented any false, or substantially exaggerated, claim for proof against the estate of a bankrupt, or used or offered to use any such claim in composition personally or by agent, proxy, or attorney, or as agent, proxy, or attorney; (9) received any property as a consideration to act or foreear to act in any propeeding in bankruptcy; (10) secreted any of his property or which is a part of or relates to

Now let us make the comparison; begin with section 2 on acts of bankruptcy; the first ground (1) as there stated is not referred to in either of the other sections, and it follows that he might be adjudged a bankrupt on that ground and still be discharged. The gentleman therefore shows by his statement that he has not examined the bill carefully, since it is conclusive on at least this one point, that he is in error in stating that an involuntary bankrupt can not be discharged.

Let us continue the examination; the second (2) ground, as stated in section 2 as above, falls under the same head, and the gentleman is therefore in error in two respects.

The third (3) ground for proceedings is that the defendant

(3) Made a transfer of any of his property with intent to defeat his cred-

By referring to the section on discharges as quoted, subdivision four (4), you will see that such a transfer is not a ground for refusing a discharge if "such property shall have been surrendered to the trustee." The gentleman's statement is therefore inaccurate in this respect. He is in error therefore in at least three particulars.

The fourth (4) ground as stated in section 2 is not referred to in either of the other sections and therefore justifies the scoring of the fourth error against the gentleman who has thus maligned

The fifth (5) ground for beginning a suit relates to dealing in options. Such an act is neither an offense nor a ground for refusing a discharge. Another error must therefore be credited to my colleague.

The sixth (6) act of bankruptcy relates to giving a preference. Although a debtor might be adjudged a bankrupt on this ground, still he would be entitled to a discharge as you will see by reference to section 13, (2) if such preference has been surrendered to the trustee. Still the gentleman continues in error.

The seventh (7) ground is not set out in either of the other sections and the score of errors therefore numbers seven.

The eighth (8) ground relates to the secreting or hiding away of property for the purpose of defrauding the creditors; a bankrupt who has been guilty of that act would not (see (10) section 29) and ought not to be given a discharge. The gentleman's statement is, I am glad to say, correct in this particular, and I accordingly score one in his favor.

Coverded nice (9) and tan (10) are not referred to in sections 12.

Grounds nine (9) and ten (10) are not referred to in sections 13 20, and two additional errors must therefore be charged.

The statement therefore, that no involuntary bankrupt can get a discharge is an error; if adjudged a bankrupt on any one of nine grounds he may, so far as such grounds are concerned, secure a discharge; if adjudged a bankrupt on one ground he will, on that account, be denied a discharge. There are other grounds on which a discharge may be refused. I therefore again call attention to the fact that the opposition to this bill is founded chiefly upon a want of information as to its provisions and a mis-conception of the results which it will accomplish.

WILLIAM A. STONE. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Certainly.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Why not give the bankrupt who applies for a discharge the right of trial by jury on the specification-

cation—
Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. He has that right.
Mr. WILLIAM, A. STONE (continuing). The same as you give him the right of trial when he is adjudicated a bankrupt?
There is no provision in the bill for any such action.
Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. He has it now.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, no.
Mr. WOLVERTON. I will say that no objection on that account was made to the bill in the argument of my friend when count was made to the bill in the argument of my friend when he was on the floor the other day, nor do I see that it would be objectionable to be incorporated in the bill as an amendment if

But what I do complain of before the House is the wholesale denunciation that this bill has received by the opponents without an effort on their part to try to correct alleged imperfections and to make it a permanent law. Have you not got the courage to and to make its permanential. Have young to the courage to do it? Is there a want of ability to do it? I know it is not that. But these criticisms are for the purpose of defeating any law upon the subject. They are for the purpose, in many instances, of retaining the infamous attachment and assignment acts which are upon the statute books of many States.

I have criticised at some length the argument of my colleague [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] merely for the purpose of showing that this bill is not infamous, as it has been stigmatized by very many who have argued against it, and for the purpose of drawing attention to its provisions.

I have no doubt that if the gentleman, with his ability and his experience, and others who have criticised this measure, were to experience, and others who have criticised this measure, were to get together and suggest amendments and consider the matter curefully and candidly, not seeking for some little loophele in the bill or some little point which they can criticise as unsatisfac-tory, for the mere purpose of condemning it as a measure—if they were thus to seek to perfect this bill, they either would find that it was perfect, or we would concede their points and thereby make it so.
Mr. RAY. Will the gentleman p
Mr. WOLVERTON. Certainly.

Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. RAY. I do not suppose the gentleman wants to be inac-

Mr. RAY. I do not suppose the gentleman wants to be inac-curate in any of his statements?

Mr. WOLVERTON. No, certainly not.

Mr. RAY. I had the floor for an hour and a half, and I criti-cised this bill rather severely in some of its particulars. Three days before I addressed the House on the bill, I printed in the RECORD proposed amendments which I suggested, and I deliberately stated that I criticised the bill for the purpose of having it amended. So I hope the gentleman will not make the wholesale charge that every gentleman who has criticised the bill has done it for the purpose of defeating it.

Mr. WOLVERTON. If my statement was as broad as suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Ray] it was in-correct to that extent. I believe the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY] did suggest some amendments, and did state that he was in favor of the passage of a uniform bankruptcy law by this Congress, but that he disapproved of some of the provisions of this bill

Mr. RAY. That is it.
Mr. WOLVERTON. I was notalluding to the criticism of the gentleman from New York. His method of argument is proper and fair. This House is able to take up a bill, if it is argued in that spirit, with a view of making suggestions and amendments and to perfect the bill. I have at least no doubt that after it has received the careful consideration of this House, instead of its hostile criticism, and has gone to the Senate and received fair consideration there, and if the two Houses can not agree, then after consideration by a conference committee, it will result in the enactment of a law creating an uniform system of bankruptey throughout the United States that will be as beneficial as any legislation that could be enacted by this Congress.

I have taken more time than I ought, and yet, as a matter of curiosity, and perhaps to show the reason why some of my friends adhere to their views against all measures that might be introduced for the purpose of creating an uniform system of bankruptey, I wish to call attention to the fact that they have, on the statute books of their States, laws which are infamous in every particular, and calculated to produce injustice and inequalities between creditors, and which are harsh in their operations upon debtors. A comparison with these laws and this bill will show that it is a just and humane measure.

Take, for instance, the law that prevails in the State of Texas on the subject of attachments. Here is a fair sample of the attachment laws that now prevail and are upon the statute books of the different States. This applies to debts not due as well as to debts which are due:

The judges and clerks of the district courts, county courts, and justices of the peace may issue writs of original attachment, returnable to their respective courts, upon the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney making an affidavit in writing, stating:

1. That the defendant is justiy indebted to the plaintiff in a certain amount.

2. That the defendant is not a resident of the State, or is a foreign corporation are entire as anyth.

tion, or acting as such.

3. That he is about to remove permanently out of the State, and has ressed to pay or secure the debt of the plaintiff.

4. That he secretes himself so that the ordinary process of law can not be ved upon him, That he has secreted his property for the purpose of defrauding his cred-That he is about to secrete his property for the purpose of defrauding

6. That he is about to secrete his property out of the State, without leaving sufficient remaining to pay his debts.
7. That he is about to remove his property, or part of it, out or the county in which suit is brought with intent to defraud his creditors.
9. That he has disposed of his property, in whole or in part, with intent to defraud his creditors.

fraud his creditors. 10. That he is about to dispose of his property with intent to defraud his creditors.

11. That he is about to convert his property, or a part thereof, into money, for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors.

In every case the creditor could make an affidavit there that a man who was about to sell a horse was doing it for the purpose of converting it into money for the purpose of placing it beyond the reach of his creditors, because that is the ordinary course of trade, in order to get the money.

Mr. STOCKDALE. In reference to all these attachment laws which have been spoken of by the gentlem in almost every State in the Union, when they are attaching goods the creditor must give bond to indemnify the defendant against any damage

Mr. WOLVERTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he ever knew of any such bond being sued upon in his life? We have the same provision in Penusylvania. Under this bill property can not be seized before adjudication until after a good bond shall have been given.

Mr. STOCKDALE. If the gentleman will allow me to answer that question, I will state that almost generally the damages may be assessed upon that bond in the same suit.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But only in case the judgment is set aside

Mr. STOCKDALE. If the attachment fails, then he can sue for damages.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. That would be done in the regular way of setting it aside.

Mr. STOCKDALE. If the attachment is defeated, in most of the States he can sue for damages.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. How can it be defeated except by being set aside?

Mr. STOCKDALE. I think there is some difference between defeating and setting aside, if I understand the English language. Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. The attachment is a pre-Hminary thing.

Mr. STOCKDALE, You will find in the general attachment laws in the States that you take the attachment and the property, then you show cause, and if you fail, the party has a cause of damages against you.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. That does not occur in bankruptcy. There is no provision of that kind in bankruptcy.

think that was probably in the old bill.

Mr. WOLVERTON. There is this difference between the bankruptcy law and the law I have just read as being the law of Texas. Down in Texas they are against the creditor if he lives out of Texas, but if he lives in Texas there is no law too sharp for him.

for him.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Against the poor debtor? Mr. STOCKDALE. They want to treat foreigners with courtesy.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I hope the gentlemen have settled this question between themselves.

Mr. STOCKDALE. To our satisfaction. Mr. WOLVERTON. To your satisfaction.

In view of the attachment and exemption laws they have in Texas nobody can be compelled to pay their debts.

Mr. BAILEY. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, with all our exemptions, we pay our debts better than any people in the Union

Mr. WOLVERTON. They pay 10 per cent for money and upward.

Mr. BAILEY. But we pay it.

Mr. BAILEY. Why do not they go to Mississippi, where they have no such exemption as we have in Texas?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have not examined the laws of Mississippi as to that point.

Mr. BAILEY. The exemption laws there are very similar to those of other States.

those of other States.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Take Texas, Kansas, and the Dakotas, and even Illinois, and other States where the exemptions are so liberal, no man need be afraid of any process of execution against his property. The proposed enactment does not disturb the homestead exemption. It allows a man to retain as much property as is exempt under the State laws. The involuntary provisions do not apply to farmers, nor to wage-earners. The honest farmer or wage-earner who is poor and who owes debts of any amount may under the voluntary provisions of this act be disamount may under the voluntary provisions of this act be dis-charged from debts he is unable to pay. As a sample of the ex-emption laws which I have spoken of, I will refer to those which prevail in Texas.

By the Constitution of 1875 the homestead of a family, not in a town or city, is made to consist of not more than 200 acres of land, which may be in one or more parcels, with the improvements thereon. The homestead in a city, town, or village of lot or lots not to exceed $5,000 in value at the time of designation, without reference to the value of improvements thereon; provided the same shall be used for the purpose of a home, or as a place to exceed the calling or business of the head or a family. The homestead is protected from forced sale for the payment of all debts, except for purchase money, taxes due thereon, or for work and material used in constructing improvements thereon, and in respect to the last, the contract for work and material must be with the consent of the wife given in the manner provided by law.

In addition to this it is provided that in case of the death of a person leaving wife and children, or either, there shall be granted out of the estate a sun sufficient to support them for one year; also if the exempted articles provided for by law do not exist in kind, the property of the estate may be sold for each to raise their value, not to exceed $6,000 for homestead, and $500 for further exempted property.

There is also exempted to every family, free from forced sale for all deby sall household and kitchen furniture; any lot or lots for sepulture in a cometery; all implements of husbandry; all tools and apparatus belonging to any trade or profession; and all books belonging to public or private libraries, and family portraits and pictures; five milch cows and calves; two yoke of work oxen; two horses and one wagon; one carriage or buggy; one gun; twenty hogs; twenty head of sheep; all provisions and forage on hand for home consumption; all bridles, saddies, and harness necessary for the use of the family. And to every citizen not a head of a family, one horse, bridle, and saddie; all wearing apparel; any lot or lots for sepulture in a cometery; all tools, apparatus, or books belonging to his trade, profession or private library. Current wages for personal service are not subject to garnishment. Articles otherwise exempt may be made subject to valid liens. (See Liens.)

Now, I can see how my friends from Texas can afford to resist Now, I can see flow my friends from Texas call allord to resist the passage of this or any other bankrupt act. Any debtor in Texas to-day, with the enormous exemptions he has allowed him, and with the attachment laws of that State in force, is entirely proof against any creditor in New York or elsewhere who may sell him goods on credit.

Mr. KILGORE. The exemptions in Texas are pretty well understood, and any man who deals with a citizen of Texas deals understood, and any man who deals with a citizen of these exemptions and it is not become a support of these exemptions. with him with full knowledge of those exemptions, and if he wants to hold him responsible, he ought to take care to ascertain that the man has property over and above those exemptions that will be liable for debt.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That is all correct, and I do not know

That is all correct, and I do not know of anything that could be put upon the statute books of any State of anything that could be put upon the statute books of any State that would go further than such legislation as this to promote immigration. The character of the people who would immigrate there, however, might be questionable. [Laughter.] For several years the State of Kansas, because of its liberal homestead exemption laws, has been the refuge of nearly all the fraudulent debtors who have migrated from my State, though perhaps some of them may have gone to Texas. Certainly homestead exemptions like this would promote immigration, and I hope they will keep such laws upon their statute books in Texas and in other States to encourage emigration of a ce tain kind from my own State. [Laughter.] There are, however, advocates even in Texas of the passage of a uniform bankrupt law at this time. I have a clipping from the Dallas Times-Herdd this time. I have which I will read: I have a clipping from the Dallas Times-Herald

A BANKRUPTCY BILL.

A bill to relieve the great and constantly increasing class of hopelessly insolvent debtors is now an imperious necessity. The present demand for this bill is not from one, but from all classes.

The people are entitled to eujoy all the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution. One of these rights is to have enacted a bankrupey law. That right can not be enjoyed save through Congressional legislation. From all over the Union bodies of all sorts and petitioners from all classes have been for seven years and are now demanding the passage of this bill with a unanimity that is pronounced and pressing. The bill seems a wise, conservative, and economical measure, meeting adequately the just demands of the people.

Congress should pass the bill, and Messrs. Culberson, Kilgore, and Arliev should forego their opposition to it.

Mr. KILGORE. I wish to say that that is an evening paper published in Dallas, which probably echoes an editorial written perhaps by Mr. Torrey or some other friend of this bill. [Laugh-I think that paper itself went into the hands of a receiver some time since

Mr. WOLVERTON. Many intelligent and sound reasons have been expressed by the newspapers of Texas for the enactment of this bill. I submit and will have printed a few of them.

An able address was made in support of this bill in the Fifty-first Congress by the Hon. Littleton W. Moore from Texas; it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of July—

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I wish to ask my colleague the question: Did you ever know a proposed law which authorized notices to be given by advertising through the newspapers that was not favored by all the papers that knew of the provision.

[Laughter. Mr. WOLVERTON. I never have known of a newspaper be-Mr. WOLVERTON. I never have known of a newspaper being bought as the gentleman intimates. I suppose that the publishers of newspapers, to a limited extent, are governed, as well as lawyers and other people, by considerations of self interest. It is simply absurd for my colleague to intimate that the very general indorsement given this bill by the press throughout the country is because there will be a petty amount of advortising for one paper in each judicial district.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And to the extent of their interest they outly not to be guides of public opinion.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. And to the extent of their interest they ought not to be guides of public opinion.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I know that the papers which are now and have been supporting this bill have not done it with the expectation of getting a three or four dollar advertisement now and then. They are far above that.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. But you do know that this bill makes a great deal of advertising for the newspapers?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not. It provides for an economical administration of bankrupt estates; far more economical than any law that I have examined.

any law that I have examined.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Penn-Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Penisylvania a question before he passes from this point as to the general indorsement which this bill is stated to have received. I ask him whether he believes that one out of a thousand of those who have indorsed this bill has ever read it? I undertake to say that not half of the members of this House have read the bill through.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I am bound to believe that those who have indorsed the bill have read it. As to the members of the House, I am led to believe that your statement is true—it must.

I think, be true as to some of the gentlemen who have spoken

In opposition to the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Then surely the indorsement of the bill by persons who have not read it can not possess very much weight, I should think, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I did not concur in your insinuation as to the indorsers.

Let me submit what the brick manufacturers of the country think about it; possibly you will realize that they know what they are talking about:

NATIONAL BRICK MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION, Indianapolis, Ind., January 22, 1891.

To the Congress of the United States:

NATIONAL BRICK MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION, Indianapolis, Ind., January 22, 1891.

To the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, the National Brick Manufacturers' Association of the United States of America, assembled in its fifth annual convention, respectfully urges upon your honorable bodies the passage of the Torrey bankrupt bill, and submits as reasons therefor the following:

(1) The members of this association, in their capacities as business men and manufacturers of bricks, which are extensively used in all the States of the Union, are interested in common with the persons, firms, and corporations to whom they sell their products in having their rights and responsibilities clearly and fully defined by one equitable, national uniform law, instead of by the varying laws of the States in which they do business.

(2) The members of this association, as the purchasers of large quantities of supplies, are interested in the passage of that bill in common with the persons, firms, and corporations from whom they purchase, as it will extend credit, prevent frand, and restore and maintain confidence between business men, manufacturers, mechanics, and bankers.

(3) The members of this association, as consumers of commodities, are interested in the enactment of a law which will enable the sellers of goods to collect the price, or a part of it, of the goods sold, to the end that honest people who pay their debts will not have to pay in multiplied profits for the losses sustained by the sellers of goods to dishonest persons.

4. The members of this association, in their dual capacities as debtors and creditors, are interested in the placing upon the statute books of a law which will be perfectly fair to them in those capacities.

In view of the foregoing it is—

"(1) Resolved, That the rights and responsibilities of business man, manufacturer, and mechanic in this, that it will give to him additional credit, open to him additional markets, and reduce the hazards of business.

"(3) Resolved further, That it is

Mr. BAILEY. Permit me a word further. The gentleman has arraigned me as one of those who are opposed to a system of bankrupter

Mr. WOLVERTON. No.

Mr. BAILEY. I am as much in favor of a proper bankruptcy law as the gentleman from Pennsylvania or any other gentleman can be.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have not said that you are opposed to a bankrupt bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I understood my name to have been

Mr. WOLVERTON. This is taken from a newspaper pub-

Ished in your own State.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. WOLVERTON. So far as I am informed on the subject, the gentleman, I hope, is going to advocate the passage of this

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman knows I am not, or ought to know it. But I want to say a word further. The gentleman has read an extract from a newspaper saying that I ought to forego my opposition to this measure. Now, I undertake to say that there is not a man connected with the paper which thus passes there is not a man connected with the paper which this passes on the merits of this bill who has ever read the bill or even seen it. An expression of that kind weighs very little with me, as I am sure it must with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I do not concur in the gentleman's insulation. I do not think that anyone, whether the publisher of the property of the publisher.

of a newspaper or a member of Congress, is competent to discuss the provisions of any proposed legislation unless he has read them. The presumption is that the editors of all of these papers are familiar with the provisions of the bill; many of the articles refer to the fact that the writer has read this bill carefully section by section, or that they have consulted attorneys in whom they have confidence who have read it and given favorable opinions as to its provisions. These opinions come from some of the ablest men in the State of Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Half of those articles were written right here in Washington.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have no means of knowing whether the gentleman speaks upon information or only belief

I find that almost every prominent newspaper, not only in the State of Texas but in my own State and in every State in the Union, advocates the passage of this bill. I find that petitions have been presented to this House and the Senate during the last two or three years asking the passage of this bill, the petitioners stating that they have examined its provisions and approve them. The writers of many of these newspaper clippings and other articles which I have before me state that they examined the bill carefully, while others state that they have had them examined by others who are competent to pass judgment upon them.

Interviews with leading lawyers in the South, in the North, in the East, and in the West show that they ask for the passage of this bill or of the bill which was before the FIfty-second Coness—a measure which the Judiciary Committee of the present

House has modified and improved.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question on that line. Does he believe that there is a member of this House, including himself, who is in favor of passing this identi-

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes.
Mr. STOCKDALE. Are you in favor of this bill just as it is?
Mr. WOLVERTON. I would like to see one or two or more
Mr. WOLVERTON. I would like to see one or two or more amendments made to the bill, but if there are no amendments offered, I will vote for the bill just as it is. And I have heard expressions from a number of other members of the House, and I believe a majority of them will vote for this bill just as it is. Is there anything in this bill which should justify any member of the House in refusing to vote for it? Its provisions for voluntary bankruptcy meet, I believe, the approbation of everyone who has examined them.

As to the provisions for involuntary bankruptcy, any one who will read them over carefully must come to the conclusion that this is a fair and just bill in its present form, even without amendment, and if it can not be amended, should pass as it now stands. It differs materially from the act of 1867 as to the mode under which proceedings are to be conducted. If it is alleged against any person that he has committed any act of bankruptcy, under the second section of the bill, for instance, has made a transfer of his property with intent to defeator defraud his creditors, which, under the operation of the statutes of every State, even where a contract is made for the purpose of carrying it out, I believe has been declared in all instances to be void; when an allegation is made by a petitioner or petitioners that such a person has committed such an act of bankruptcy he has notice, fifteen days' notice, to appear in court, and he may demand a jury trial; and in involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy the peti-tioner is bound by law, under the decisions of the courts, to establish affirmatively every proposition necessary to give the court jurisdiction.

While a man in voluntary proceedings may submit his estate to the administration of the bankrupt courts when he alleges that a debtor has committed an act of bankruptcy, it enables him to force him into a bankrupt court, and if the party thus forced into the court comes in and files his answer, denying the allegations of the petition, he has a right to trial before twelve of his peers to determine whether he has made the assignment for the purpose of defeating, injuring, or delaying his creditors.

Mr. STOCKDALE. And 200 miles from home perhaps.

Mr. WOLVERTON. The bankruptcy courts sit near to the homes of the great body of the people who will have business in them. It is the only court which can take jurisdiction of bank-ruptcy proceedings under the Constitution. Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. And that same provision was in the law of 186'

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes; and in every other law on the subject ever passed. Mr. STOCKDALE. We know how it worked down in our country; it was a pretty hard condition of affairs, induced largely by that very provision.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It is a provision which is essential in every bankrupt law, however.

Mr. WilLiAM A. STONE. Do you call a jury picked up around the marshal's office, for example, tipstaffs, guards of prisoners, and others of that kind, a "jury of peers;" men whose interest is the marshal's interest, which is to make as much fees for the marshal as possible?

Mr. WOLVERTON. The question, Mr. Chairman, which has just been submitted to me is foreign to the question under dis cussion, and is an insinuation that in the western district of Pennsylvania, in which I reside, the circuit courts and the disriot courts are conducted in violation of law, and that the judges and marshals and district attorney are scoundrels.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Oh, no.

Mr. WOLVERTON. The gentleman himself was once a dis-

Mr. WOLVERTON. The gentleman himself was once a district attorney, and it may have been true that they then selected the deadbeats and bums around the offices in the public buildings for such purposes; but to-day I wish to say that they are summoned from all parts of my district, and are properly recommended before being put into the panel. I do not believe that the United States courts are improperly administered in that regard. A man against whom an allegation is made, or who has committed some act of bankruptcy under the second section of the bill, has the right of trial by jury, and the jury composed of proper persons is to determine whether he has committed the act or not within the meaning of the law.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? The gentleman from Pennsylvania has a great deal to say about

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has a great deal to say about jury trials. I suppose the custom prevails in Pennsylvania as in jury trials. I suppose the custom prevails in Pennsylvania as in Texas for a district judge of the court to assume the right to comment on the testimony and to charge by the weight of the testimony in the case, so that a jury trial in many cases under such circumstances results simply in a farce.

Mr. WOLVERTON. The trial by jury is a highly important right accorded to the citizen.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand, of course, it is, where the jury is left to judge of the facts and the court to charge according to the law. But that is not the case in the United States courts. Their discretion has been abused à dozen times in our country in directing the particular verdict which shall be refindered by in directing the particular verdict which shall be rendered by

Mr. WOLVERTON. I am not aware of such cases of abuse, and it may be that my friend from Texas has not the same high standard of judges that the other States have.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, we have been improving a little re-

Mr. WOLVERTON. It may be that the people have not confidence in their courts, or in the trial by jury in many cases; and I could readily understand the opposition to the system for that reason. But in my State we have the most implicit confidence in the circuit and district judges; and I would feel assured if a person against whom an act of bankruptey was alleged claimed the right of trial by jury, the judge in the western dis-trict of Pennsylvania would see that the trial was granted to him in the proper sense of the word.

Mr. WILL! AM A. STONE. No question of that.
Mr. WOLVERTON. And he would have a perfectly fair jury.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I am not objecting to the judges.
Noone has a higher regard for them than I have; but my objec-

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON] desire to conclude to-night? If not, will he yield to a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I would like to have ten or fifteen minutes more in the morning.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then if the gentleman will yield to me for that purpose, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman says he only has fifteen minutes more

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, we are to have a caucus to-night and

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON] has the floor.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] for the purpose of allowing him to move that the committee do now rise

Mr. BAILEY. It interferes with the arrangement of the de-bate, and I must insist that the gentleman conclude this evening.

He only wants fifteen minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman yields to me to make the motion that the committee rise, and certainly he ought to be allowed to conclude in the morning.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman yields, I must object to his retaining the floor, because it interferes with the arrangement of the debate.

Mr. REED. Certainly, Mr. Chairman, it can not be in the power of any one gentleman to object to such a request as this. Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON] prefers to conclude to-morrow.
Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes; I am tired now.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Illinois would suggest that there is no quorum present— Mr. SPRINGER. How will you ascertain that under the

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

Wolverton] will proceed.

Mr. Wolverton. In another particular this act is far more simple and less expensive than the act of 1867. One of the abuses to which the act of 1867 was subjected was the expense abuses to which the act of the caused by the register who was appointed for each Congressional district.

The man who filed a petition in bankruptcy, whether voluntary or involuntary, was obliged to file with his petition a considerable sum of money. Proofs of claims were required to be made before the register or United States commissioner, whereas now this referee is only allowed a fee of $10, to be filed with the petition, and I per cent on the net amount paid in dividends to the creditors when an estate is administered, and a half of 1 per cent on all sums paid in composition.

The trustee's fees are also limited.

Objection was made by the learned gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the insufficiency of the compensation of the referee, and he stated that competent men could not be secured to fill such positions.

The gentleman's objection in the previous Congress was that the expenses were too great, that there was a salary attached to the office of referee. That has been modified so as to provide for the office of referee. That has been modified so as to provide for the payment of fees. The gentleman's objection then was that the salary of $1,000 per year would be a great burden.

The effect of giving the referee a limited fee in each case and a percentage on the amount distributed to the creditors is to induce him to so administer the estate as to make the dividends as large as possible, and do it as speedily as possible.

I believe a careful examination of this bill by the members of this House will show that all of the objections which led to the abuses under the act of 1867, and which largely influenced Congress in the repeal of the act in 1878, have been eliminated from it; that it is a speedy way of administering the estate of a bank-it; that it is a speedy way of administering the estate of a bankrupt, that it is inexpensive, and that it is just.

I do not say that there are not some provisions of this bill that might not perhaps be bettered by amendments. Some amendments have been suggested by the lawyers of this body. When we come to consider the bill in detail I do not know but that I would vote for some of those proposed amendments; but if the provisions of the bill are not amended, after a fair discussion of them, I am willing to vote for this bill rather than have no bill on the subject passed by this Congress.

bill on the subject passed by this Congress.

How much longer will the members of this House allow the 150,000 and more people, a large proportion of whom are bonkrupts, to labor under the load that they can not bear? How much longer will they deprive the community of the benefit of the experience and energy of these men who have been curied down by misfortunes unforceseen by them, and which perhaps could not have been anticipated? How much longer will they allow honest creditors to be robbed by fraudulent debtors and by fraudulent associate creditors? There is no member here who does not know men of this character in his own district, and perhaps in his own town, energetic business men of the country, who within the last ninety days, or the last four months, have been driven to the verge of bankruptcy, if not actually into insolvency, because of the financial stringency which they could not control.

Shall we refuse to act? Shall we say it has not been demanded by the people in the presence of the list of indorsements which I have submitted? Why should we not respond to the demands of people who are doubtless quite as wise as we are, and who have as much at stake, especially when they assert the necessity for such legislation, and submit for our consideration a bill which ombodies the relief they need?

I submit and will have printed a memorial as to the financial condition which is able and logical, and is entitled to the thoughtful consideration of every member of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I objected a moment ago under the impression that the gentleman could conclude in a few mo-ments. If he has more that he desires to say, and if he thinks he can not conclude within fifteen minutes, I am perfectly willing for him to yield now and to resume when the bill comes up for consideration again. My objection was based on the belief that he would be able to conclude in fifteen minutes; and I thought the House should sit that much longer "ather than to carry the gentleman over to another day. It is at parent to me now that he can not conclude within that time without unduly hurrying himself, and I am entirely willing for the gentleman to have all the time he wants. If it is agreeable to him, in the above sence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It will be agreeable to me.

When the committee rose at the time this bill was under consideration I was explaining that this bill was entirely different in its provisions from the act of 1867, and that all the objectionfr.

788 nable features of that bill had been eliminated. I am satisfied that a careful examination will show you that one of the great objections to the former act—the expense attending the admin-objections to the former act—the expense attending the administration of estates—has been corrected and that it will be impossible under this bill for officers or anyone connected with the winding up of an estate to charge more than reasonable fees.

Since my former discussion of this bill a letter has been handed to me by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK], showing what abuses are practiced in that State under existing laws in the scramble among creditors of a failing debtor. The following are the letter and the clipping from the Chicago Tribune referred to:

CHICAGO, October 29, 1893.

DEAR SIR: We are greatly interested in the bankruptcy bill now pending in the House, and most earnestly hope for its passage. The fact that not in one failure out of ten has the creditor anything to say, and that the most stupendous frauds are practiced, with no possible redress to the creditor adoption of this measure. Every business interest in the country requires it, and the only class that oppose it are those who, by reason of their position and legal equipment, have advantage over all other merchants. Their opposition is purely selfish and greedy, and the main one in the city belonging to that class, which is the largest firm in the West, never settles, we are told, for less than one hundred cents on the dollar.

We inclose clipping from the Tribune of this morning, which displays a fair sample of failures, as now made, and how they are handled. The resultant effects are as clear as the noon-day sun—enormous lawyers' fees, business annibilated, without anything for the unsecured or merchandise creditor. A better or more convincing argument for the necessity of national legislation on this subject can not be found.

If agreeable, we ask that you kindly and particularly extend your best efforts and influence for the enactment of this meritorious law.

Very truly yours.

BATTLE FOR A STORE—CREDITORS AT WAR OVER FRANKENTHAL, FREUDENTHAL & CO.—WOODCOCK HOLDS THE FORT AGAINST A RIVAL RECEIVER AND EVEN REPULAES THE UNITED STATES MARSHAL—HE "CRACKS" THE BIG SAFE TO GET AT THE BOOKS FOR AN INVENTORY—PINKERTORS KEEP POSSESSION IN THE NAME OF THE TITLE AND TRUST COMPANY—MANY SUITS BROUGHT—ARGUMENTS TO-DAY.

Vigorous efforts were made by representatives of various creditors yesterday to obtain possession of Frankenthal, Freudenthal & Co.'s store. A second receiver was appointed on the petition of a creditor. The Federal authorities were appealed to by another. The United States marshal sent out in response to the appeal failed to get possession, as did the second receiver. The safe, which was locked when the Mooney & Boland men vacated the store Wednesday night, was "cracked" by an expert employed by the receiver named by Judge Brentano. The affairs of the firm will come before Judge Brentano this morning, when an attempt will be made to unrayel the complications which have arisen.

There were more than a dozen Pinkerton men scattered through the store yesterday morning. A big one stood behind the glass door and denied admittance to every person unless he was supplied with an order signed by Attorney Mayer. Even this was not accepted until the watchman had held a conference with the attorney by telephone and had the order confirmed. Early in the day Arthur Woodcock and assistants, representing the receiver arrived to take an inventory and examine the books. They struck a snag immediately. The safe was locked, its bolts having been shot before the Mooney & Boland men vacated the premises. Receiver Woodcock sent over for Attorney Mayer, who ordered him to get an expert and have the safe "cracked."

THE BIG SAFE IS CRACKED.

A few moments later pedestrians on the street caught sight of the curious spectacle of a man in his shirt sleeves working with a drill on the doors of the locked strong box. He was an expert from a neighboring safe company. Representatives of other interests in the litigation were in the store. One telephoned Judge Brentano. Attorney Mayer was called to the telephone immediately by the judge. The result of the conversation was that it was agreed the receiver should not take the books out of the store. In five minutes the safe was open.

While this was going on lawyers in the case were busy preparing fresh sults, which when filed served to further tighten the tangle into which the affairs of the firm have apparently passed. At 10 o'clock lawyers for both sides went into Judge Brentano's court to argue a motion made to remove the receiver. The entire afternoon was consumed in the arguments. The hearing was brought to an end by Judge Brentano putting the case over until this morning.

hearing was brought to an end by Judge Brentano putting the case over antil this morning.

While this hearing was going on Emanuel Frankenthal's attorneys went into Judge McConnell's court with a bill making Charles E. Frankenthal defendant, and asking for a receiver for so much of the property as is covered by his mortgage. The court granted the application and appointed Sam Bloch receiver. As there could not be two receivers in possession of the same property, Mr. Bloch did not get upon the premises.

UNITED STATES COURT GETS INTO THE CASE.

UNITED STATES COURT GETS INTO THE CASE.

A fresh knot was tied by Attorneys Moses, Pam & Kennedy, who called on the United States court to help them get possession of property in the store. Attorney Moses of the firm went before the United States court and swore out a writ of attachment for $10,000 in favor of S. Wright, fr., of New York. The writ was given to a deputy United States marshal to serve. He went to the store at 7 p. m., and knocking on the door demanded admission. He was refused. The marshal showed his badge. The door was opened and he walked in. Then F. E. Jennison, representing the receiver, explained the stituation. The marshal then withdrew out of deference to the State courts to await their action in the premises.

Added to the complications made by these suits is a petition filed in the county court on behalf of the unsecured creditors, whose claims exceed $20,000 in the aggregate, asking that a general assignment be declared for the benefit of all creditors. A large number of replevin suits, too, have been filed in the circuit court, and the writs are in the hands of the sheriff, who, however, can do nothing with them as long as the receiver appointed by Judge Brentano is in possession. Should the order appointing this receiver be vacated it will then be within the province of Receiver Bloch's duty to immediately take possession under the authority he derives from the order of Judge McConnell.

The sheriff will be on hand this morning in Judge Brentano's court, and will make a strong effort to get in ahead of Mr. Bloch should the receivership of the American Trust and Savings Bank be terminated. Once in possession the sheriff would recover the goods specified in the writs of replevin which he holds.

The store might have been mistaken for a police barracks last night. There was a light burning in the front part of the store, and a half dozen men in uniforms could be seen within. There were guards on each floor of the building. Custodian McGill was there and Deputy Sheriff Leyhe was in command. F. E. Jennison, representing the American Trust and Savings Bank, was prepared for a long slege to maintain his actual possession of the place.

The following is a clipping from the New York Times, referring to the same case at a later stage of the proceedings:

SHERIFF BEAT THE RECEIVER—RACE TO GET SOME PROPERTY WHEN THE JUDGE SIGNED AN ORDER.

CHICAGO, November 2.

JUDGE SIGNED AN ORDER.

CHICAGO, November 2.

Judge Brentano to-day discharged the common-law receiver appointed in the suit of New York creditors for the Frankenthal & Freudenthal property. His action left the store unprotected for a time, as the receiver had been in possession. A race for possession began at once between the sheriff, acting for judgment creditors, and a new receiver appointed in usual form by Judge McConnells.

When the representatives of the unsecured creditors reached the store on Monroe street, they found Deputy Sheriff Jones in possession under an attachment writ.

The sheriff is the only officer now in possession, and he proposes to hold out against all comers. Outside the store twenty wagons were drawn up in line. In them replevin creditors were expecting to carry goods. Deputy Jones said he would deliver the material called for by their replevin writs.

The receiver appointed in the common-law proceeding and now discharged was the American Trust and Savings Bank. The subsequent receiver is Samuel Block. Samuel Block

This could not have occurred if this bill had been enacted into This could not have occurred if this bill had been enacted into a law. The debtors could have applied for the benefit of the act. Could have offered a compromise with the creditors, or, if they had committed any of the acts of bankrutcy, the creditors could have filed a petition against them, and in either way avoided the wasting of the debtor's property.

This is only one of thousands of cases constantly occurring throughout the country.

throughout the country.

Corporations are excluded from the benefits of the voluntary provisions of the bill but may be forced into involuntary bank-ruptcy, but in no event can they they be discharged from the payment of their debts.

As to the criticism that the bill does not include national banks, I would say that this question was carefully considered by the committee and it was deemed unwise to include them. The national banking laws are very strict. Banks are subject to frequent examination and held to most rigid accountability by the Comptroller of the Currency, and, in my judgment, it would be very dangerous and unwise to give them any privileges under a bankrupt act. Many banks would only be too glad to embrace the provisions of such a bill.

It has been said that we are approaching a period of liquida-on. This only furnishes an additional reason for the passage tion. This only for of a bankrupt act.

Sudden liquidation would result in increasing failures enormously. No one could estimate the financial ruin that would follow the immediate collection of all outstanding overdue obli-

If a carefully considered bankrupt act is passed, it wil land only afford relief to thousands of meritorious persons who are now weighed down with the pressure of pastmisfortune and who look to the passage of a bankrupt act as the era of their deliverance from bondage, but we will be prepared for the vast number of such people who may be wrecked in coming liquidation. There are some who pretend that they would favor an act with provisions for voluntary bankruptcy only. Would it be wise to enact such a law? A moment's consideration will show anyone that such an act would be a great injury to both debtor and creditor. It would enable the fraudulent debtor or one who had the inclination to be such to secretly part with his property, and after covering up his crooked ways and passing the limitation imposing conditions against his discharge, take the benefit of the act and escape with his ill-gotten spoils and flee to some State where liberal exemption laws would shield him in their future enjoyment.

Such an act would make the conditions much worse than they now are under the various acts now in force in the different States. It would destroy credit instead of restoring and extending it. I confidently believe that such an act would be found to work such injustice to both debtor and creditor that it would meet with repeal sooner than any of its predecessors.

Why should there be any objection to the involuntary provisos of a bankrupt act? Almost every action contained in the involutary provisions of this bill is contained in one form or another of the statutes of almost every State, and in many of the statutes the provisions are severer against the debtor.

The fact that the Legislatures of every State have passed laws which punish fraudulent conveyances, concealment of person or property, hindering and delaying creditors, remove from State or county without payment of debts and fraudulent purchases, shows that the judgment of all right-minded men is against fraud in every form.

Why refuse to provide a uniform law for involuntary bank-ruptcy when every State has various provisions on the same sub-ject? Is it because there is a desire that these State laws may be used for local creditors to the injury of creditors residing outside of the State where the fraud is committed? Is it because of a desire to prevent creditors from receiving their equal share in the assets of the fraudulent debtor? Is the opposition from motives of selfishness? If so, no stronger reasons could be presented for the passage of a uniform law of bankruptcy.

A bankrupt act should be passed not alone for the benefit of debtors, but also for the benefit of creditors. If a man is unable to meet his obligations and is sinking deeper and deeper in debt the balance of his stock in trade in equity belongs to his creditors who furnished it, and should be distributed pro rata among them, and the debtor discharged from the balance of his obligations.

Will any fair-minded man say this is not right?

Will any right-minded man say that all creditors of the same class should not share equally in the assets of a fraudulent debtor, regardless of where his residence may be?

Will anyone justify for a moment the proposition that one creditor, be he rich or poor, should have the power, either by fraudulent preferences or by the employment of State attachment laws, sweep away the whole of a man's estate and deprive other worthy creditors of the same class from receiving one cent.

These are daily occurrences in every State. Men by a false show of prosperity and property gain the conmen by a laise show of prosperty and property gain the confidence of the wholesale men, procure large stocks of goods from manufacturers or dealers, and when his foreign creditors least expect it the sheriff's flag is put up and the stock is swept away from the very creditors who furnished it, and they are compelled to witness the great wrong and endure it.

Is this right? Does not this destroy confidence and credit?

Do not such transactions injure the credit of other merchants and business men in the same community? Does this not tend

It is said that this measure has been prepared by the boards of trade and that for that reason it should be defeated; this is not true, but suppose it had been and was a good measure. Who compose boards of trade? The manufacturers and merchants of every city and town throughout the United States

Will anyone here dare to stand up and advocate that it is right to cheat and defraud a man because he may be rich? Is it not as much a sin to steal from one as another? Is it a crime to be a successful manufacturer or wholesale merchant in this country? Is it a crime to succeed in any business to which an active, industrious man has devoted his energies for a business lifetime? Has he no right to suggest or advocate laws which his experience has shown him will benefit trade and enable him to grant credit to persons with comparative security?

Any argument which basis opposition to this bill on the fact that it had its origin with boards of trade is unjust, and can only be employed for the purpose of bringing any legislation on the subject into disrepute, regardless of whether the proposed act will prove beneficial or not. Such considerations should never be suggested. The questions each member should de-termine, are first, is any legislation on the subject necessary and demanded for the best interests of the whole people, and then, after a careful consideration of the whole bill, to determine whether it will accomplish if enacted what is desired. It is a question worthy of your earnest consideration, each for himself. If there are objections to any of its features, honestly and earnestly try to cure them by amendments.

I am satisfied that this House has the ability to act on this sub-ct. Why put it off for your successors?

I am confident that with an honest effort a bill will be passed. If it should prove defective in any particular, such defects can be removed by amendment in the future and will result in the establishment of a permanent act on the subject to the great benefit of all the people of this country.

I am in favor of a bankrupt law:

1. Because the framers of the Constitution imposed upon Congress the duty of passing such a law in consideration of the States yielding up their right to pass any law impairing the obligations of a contract.

2. Because the Constitution confers on honest, unfortunate insolvents the right to have such law enacted.

3. Because it will be the means of relief to thousands of unfortunate debtors who are weighed down with a burden of debt from which there is no hope of escape except through the provisions of such an act.

4. Because the passage of such a law will restore to business 4. Because the passage of such a law with restore to business life in this country thousands of men whose energy, experience, and enterprise will promote the general welfare of the people.

5. Because it will create and maintain a conservative tone to all transactions between debtors and creditors, inspire confidence and consequently restore and extend credit.

6. Because it will prevent fraudulent preferences, no matter in what form attempted, and will secure an equal distribution of assets when fraud or collusion is attempted among all creditors of the same class

Because it will secure the equitable marshaling and distribution of the estates of bankrupts to the bona fide creditors promptly and at small cost.

Because under its provisions the rights of honest debtors and honest creditors in every stage of their dealing, whether in personal and friendly conference or before the courts, will be better and more promptly and economically protected than under the present State laws.

THE NEWSPAPERS OF PENNSYLVANIA,

I am glad to say, have accorded this bill a very general indorsement. I insert a few clippings from some of them, as follows:

DEBTORS AND A BANKRUPTCY ACT.

Nothing is more curious in the history of legislation under a representative government than the peculiar notions of equity that now and then obtain and the blind way in which they induced action without the slightest regard to faces. An instance is in the opposition to the Torrey bankruptcy law on the ground that it is hostile in its operation to the interest of the "debtor class."

THE EXACT OPPOSITE OF THE TRUTH.

If we accept as the debtor class the men who in every part of the country buy goods of any kind on credit, which we suppose to be about what the opposents of the bill have in their minds, what is their interest? Is it not clearly that they shall be able to get credit for as much merchandise as they are likely to be able to sell at a fair profit and get pay for? Is not that above all other things the one which would be the most to their advantage? The answer can hardly be doubted.

Well, wishout a national bankruptcy law the seller to whom they apply for credit must take his chances of getting paid, first, from the honesty of the debtor; second, from his success in business, so that he can pay if he wishes to; and, finally, if from misiortune he is unable to pay in full, from the means afforded for collection by the laws of the State in which the buyer lives.

wheles to; and, finally, if from misjortune he is unable to pay in full, from the means afforded for collection by the laws of the State in which the buyer lives.

If the seller lives in our State and the buyer in another, he knows that these means of collecting are very uncertain. Another creditor, living in the same State with the buyer, has much better chance of getting a judgment, and may easily use up all the debtor's assets. Then if the debtor had not honest, there are many opportunities for fraudulent collusion, and in any case the means of collection are expensive and troublesome. Nor does the debtor necessarily fare any better for these disadvantages of the creditor. Under the laws of any one of many States his business may be closed up by an attachment, he may be greatly injured in property, andwhat is the equivalent of property—in business reputation; or he may practically be ruined by legal proceeding; against which he has no adequate defense. And this may happen when with a little time and a chance to continue his business and "burn himself," he might pay all his debts and have a decent chance for making a living or a fortune afterward. It is plain, under these conditions, that the seller will be cautious about giving credit. He will "discount" the risk of loss. He will give a shorter "line" of credit, and he will add something to prices as an insurance against loss. He is bound, if he be a prudent and honest merchant, to take all these precautions. It is the only way in which he can be reasonably sure of success in carrying on his own business and in meeting his own obligations.

These conditions, therefore, are not to the interest of the debtor class and to the creditor class as well.

It reduces the risks and losses and difficulties of doing business for both classes, and tends to make all business more profitable, more active, and more general, because safer, simpler, and easier.

This is exactly what the Torrey bankrupty act does. It provides a legal method by which, when a business man, witho

The power of any one creditor to inreasen or oppress a state, and against.

The whole purpose of the law is to reach an equitable, fairly speedy, inexpensive, and complete settlement of the insolvent's estate, and to set him upon his feet again. What could be more desirable for debtors than this! How can any reasonable man say that any honest debtor suffers, that in fact he does not greatly benefit by such a system?

In reality it seems as if there were a class in our Legislatures, National and State, who have a very odd notion of the interest of the debtor class, who imagine that that interest consists solely in escaping payment.

Now, that is the interest of dishonest debtors, but not of the debtor class. On the contrary, the latter, as a class, suffer from every instance in which dishonest ones escape payment, because every such instance injures credit and increases the difficulties of doing business.—Times, New York; copied by Item, Allentown, Pa.

LIBERAL AND YET JUST.

A bill prepared by Col. Torrey of St. Louis is attracting attention not only from boards of trade, but from the people more directly interested, and the press are ably discussing and approving the measure.

Business is expedited in every conceivable way by the provisions of the Business is expedited in every conceivable way by the provisions of the Torrey bill.

The Torrey bill was presented to President Harrison by a committee of commercial bodies, able addresses being made on the occasion.

Among those who then spoke were Col. James O. Broadnead, chairman of the committee: John M. Bartlett of Minneapolis, Hon. Louis Bush, president of the New Orleans Board of Trade; Hon. John H. Doyle, president of the National Bar Association; Leonard J. Gordon, president of the Board of Trade of Jersey City, N. J.; B. F. Johnson of Richmond. Va.; W. J. McManigal of Ohio, Edward C. Rogers, president of the American Paper Manufacturers' Association of the United States; and Hon. W. G. Whipple, mayor of Little Rock, Ark.

There seems to be no question as to the practical character of Col. Torry's bill. in the spirit of equity with which it deals with the important matter around which it seeks to place legal guards that will assure every interest and right involved, and when it comes before Congress, we repeat, there now seems to be no doubt, in circles where it is understood, of its passage through both branches with few if any alterations.—Independent, Harrisburg, Pa.

MEASURE IMPERATIVELY DEMANDED.

That such a law is imperatively demanded every business man in the country knows. The commercial classes have demanded such a measure for years. Boards of trade and commercial bodies all over the land have petitioned Congress for years to pass such a law.

It is an honest man's bill, and no business man who really cares for his credit can consistently oppose it.

It is expeditious, cheap, and deals fairly with the debtor and all the creditors.—New Era, Lancaster, Pa.

WILL INCREASE DIVIDENDS OF ESTATES.

When the Federal Constitution was formulated a provision was inserted reserving to Congress the sole power to enact a bankruptcy law, and the States were forbade impairing the obligation of contracts, and as a result an adequate law can only be furnished the country by Congress.

The Torrey bill fills the requirements, and there seems to be no reason why it should not go through without serious opposition.

A good feature of the bill is that it is designed to be administered with a together different results from the old law. The officers are so compensated as to make them hurry to close up an estate as soon as it can be done with due deference to the best interests of the creditors.

Under the former act the officers were all compensated in a way that interested them in prolonging the administration.—Call, Philadelphia.

WHAT IT WOULD ACCOMPLISH.

WHAT IT WOULD ACCOMPLISH.

The Torry barkruptcy bill should be placed on the statute books. The bill has elicted golden opinions from the leading business men, boards of trade, and the various commercial institutions all over the country.

With such a consensus of opinion in its favor, no factious or selfish opposition should be permitted to interfere with its passage.

In a great country like ours, with its enormous volume of business, its gigantic commercial interests, and its enterprising and speculative business men, numerous and oft-recurring cases of bankruptey are absolutely unavoidable, and such being the case, the want of a general, uniform, and equitable bankruptcy law is little short of a national grievance.

However perfect State laws may be, where business operations are so extensive and scattered, such laws are insufficient, and in many cases unjust. They leave distant creditors in a state of perpetual insecurity well calculated to lessen confidence and check the expansion of business.

The Torrey bill is the only legislative enactment now necessary to make the laws pertaining to debtor and creditor all but perfect, and its passage would mean much for the financial interests of the country.

It is admitted by all to be a just measure, admirably drafted by an ableaty.

It would if nessed relieve business may generally of a good deal of an and experienced lawyer to give ity.

It would, if passed, relieve business men generally of a good deal of an xlety, prevent many unnecessary losses, stimulate commerce, and give a wholesome impetus to enterprise and speculation.—Commercial List and Prio Current, Philadelphia.

[Meeting of Confectioners at St. Louis.] THE NATIONAL CONFECTIONERS.

Mr. Peckham. Mr. President and gentlemen. I have the pleasure of introducing to you Mr. Torrey, the author of the Torrey bankrupt bill. [Ap-adenig to you mr. Torrey, the author of the Torrey bankrupt bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Torrey. Mr. President and gentlemen: It affords me pleasure to be the recipient of your kindness, and to speak of the bankruptcy agitation and the bill which was before the last and will be before the next Congress.

At the conclusion, I will ask the members present to make any inquiries that they may desire upon any branch of the subject.

You will be interested to know that the first of two conventions which resulted in the promulgation of the Torrey bill was held in this room.

Two years ago there assembled here an earnest and aggressive body of men: they were the representatives of the commercial bodies of the country and honest insolvents. The sole purpose of their meeting was to take steps to secure the enactment of a bankrupt law by Congress, as contemplated by the Constitution.

the Constitution.

The first convention, after several days' session, adjourned to meet at Minneapolis in the fall of 1889.

At the second convention a bill was adopted and named the Torrey bankrupt bill. That measure has since been before the country, and has been indorsed by hundreds of leading bodies. A large number of national bodies, like your own, have put their seal of approval upon it. Vermont, Nevada, and idaho are the only States in which it has not been indorsed by bodies. Bodies in all the other States have indorsed the measure, and petitions have been sent from all the States.

It is necessary to go to Congress for such a law, because the framers of the Constitution inserted in that instrument a provision that Congress should have the power to enact uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptery. The same instrument prohibited the States from impairing the obligation of contracts. The result is that the States can pass a bankrupt law under which an honest man can be discharged from his debts owing to creditors which an honest man can be discharged from his debts owing to creditors residing in another State.

There are many theoretical advocates of a uniform commercial law in all of the States as the result of separate State enactment; as a practical proposition that result is impossible. In addition you have the added impossibility of having adequate State laws upon the subject.

We must, therefore, appeal to Congress for the desired law, and must continue to appeal until that body enacts the desired measure.

Our carnest endeavor has been to formulate a practical and fair law; one that would protect alike the rights of the debtor and the creditor. We believe that we have succeeded, and the indorsements we have received for the measure bear overwhelming testimony to our success.

VOLUNTARY WITHOUT INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

In some quarters persons who are thought to be enemies of bankrupt legislation in any form are advocating the passage of a voluntary bill—that is one which would permit a debtor to deliberately prepare for bankruptey, and then file his petition, without the possible interference and filing of a petition by his creditors during his preparations for the taking of that step. We think the passage of such a law would be hurtful of the best interests of the people whose interests are sought to be served by such a law.

The bill in question consists of a perfectly fair voluntary law and a perfectly fair involuntary law, so inherwoven that the only difference between them is as to who files the petition; that is to say, a person, firm, or corporation who files their own petition is referred to as a voluntary bankrupt, while one against whom a petition has been filed by his creditors is an involuntary bankrupt. The rights and responsibilities are the same, the sole difference being that, as stated, who files the petition.

You can not compel a creditor to part with his goods, and, on the other hand, you can not compel a debtor to purchase them—that is, the transaction is purely voluntary upon the part of both parties to it.

RECIPROCAL RIGHTS OF DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

RECIPROCAL RIGHTS OF DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

The amount owing by the debtor is the amount due the creditor, so that if you were to take the aggregate of all of the amounts owed by debtors it would exactly equal the aggregate of all of the amounts owed by debtors it would exactly equal the aggregate of the entire amount outstanding by creditors. It the efore seems perfectly conclusive that the rights and responsibilities should be reciprocal between the two parties to the transaction. It would, therefore, be manifestly unjust to legislate in behalf of one of the parties to the transaction to the exclusion of the rights of the other. Let me state the same proposition in a different way: Each of you purchase given articles and thereby become a debtor; you in turn sell them, and with reference to the identical articles thereby become a creditor; would it be fair for you to have rights as against the person from whom you purchased the goods without having corresponding rights as against the person to whom you sold them?

We are endeavoring to secure the enactment of a perfectly fair measure, and have, therefore, provided for equal and exact justice between debtors and creditors in their every relation.

TWO GENERAL CLASSES.

Two GENERAL CLASSES.

The acts of bankruptcy are divisible into two general classes—the one consists of acts which indicate dishonesty, and the other gives evidence of unquestioned insolvency.

It is thought that if a debtor to whom credit has been extended has been guilty of dishonest acts with reference to the property, and is endeavoring to put it beyond the reach of his creditors, that they ought to have an opportunity to collect the amount due to them.

On the other hand, if a debtor has become insolvent so that he can not pay 400 cents on the dollar the creditors ought to have an opportunity to say whether they will take such a per cent as the estate can pay or extend the time for the debtor and give him an opportunity to try and make good his contracts.

To the creditor, in a financial sense, it is immaterial whether the depreci-tion of his debt is due to the dishonesty, misfortune, or incompetency of

We earnestly believe that the enactment of the bill will redound to the best interests of the whole people. [Applause.]

A DIALOGUE.

Mr. President, I shall be glad to answer any questions which may be

Mr. President, I shall be giad to answer any questions asked.

Mr. Hooker. What provision is made for the bond of the trustee?

Mr. Torrey. The creditors fix the amount of the bond of the trustee; he must have at least two bondsmen; each of them must make an affidavit to the effect that he has unincumbered property worth at least the amount of the bond. If the court is not satisfied that the affidavits are true additional evidence may be taken as to the property qualifications of the bondsmen. Bonds will be filed in court, and may be sued upon by parties who claim to have been injured by the breach of them.

Mr. HOOKER. How is the amount regulated?

Mr. TORREY. The creditors at their meeting fix the amount.

Mr. BARNETT. Must a person owe as much as $500 before he can become a bankrupt?

Mr. Barnett. Must a person owe as much as $590 before he can become a bankrupt?

Mr. Torrey. That is the amount fixed in the bill for involuntary bankrupts; there is no limitation as to voluntary bankrupts. It was thought that it would not be worth while to provide for the administration of the estates of involuntary bankrupts who do not owe at least that amount, because of the expense incident to the administration. Mr. Perkins. Is there anything in the bill that has the effect of quashing any proceedings that may have been begun in State courts in anticipation of the effect of the bill upon creditors or debtors in the United States?

Mr. TORREY. Do you refer to proceedings in assignment or in attachment Mr. Perkins. For instance, I will say in attachment. A creditor may commence proceedings in attachment and so prevent the collection of the claims of other creditors in other States. My question is whether, under this bill, any one can go into a United States court and set aside proceedings which might have been begun in a State court.

Mr. TORREY. Yes, sir. An adjudication in bankruptcy will result in a transfer of the assets to the jurisdiction of the Federal court in cases where assignments have been made under a State law.

It will result in a setting aside of attachments which have been levied within four months prior to the filing of the petition.

All suits will be stayed until the administration of the estate, unless the court shall direct that they shall be prosecuted for a determination of matters in controversy.

One of the chief purposes of the bill is to prevent and set aside preferences and provide a pro rata distribution of theestate to the creditors of the same class.

It is thought by our friends that the giving and receiving of preferences is class.

It is thought by our friends that the giving and receiving of preferences is permicious. Let me illustrate the flatter in this way: If it were to be rumored here to-day that a debtor of a number of y u was being pressed financially you would hurriedly telegraph to have him attached, with the thought that if you succeeded in attaching first you would collect dollar for dollar of your indebtedness, while creditors who were not so prompt would not be likely to succeed in collecting any part of the amount due. The necessity for this kind of precipitate action, in order to preserve your rights, frequently results in the financial ruin of men who are honest, and who, under ordinary circumstances, would be able to pay the entire amount rights, frequently results in the financial ruin of men who are honest, and who, under ordinary circumstances, would be able to pay the entire amount due from them.

Does it not occur to you, as business men, that it is exceedingly unfortunate that under the laws of most of the States you can not have a creditor's meeting, because if the creditors are invited to come to a meeting they know that there is trouble on hand, and, as a result, endeavor to secure preferences by attachments prior to the date of the meeting. If they are successful, they of course do not attend the meeting and will not accept any terms of compromise. As a result commercial death is very much more prevalent than it ought to be, and the aggregate dividends received by creditors are very much smaller than they would be under a wise and just law. If this law was in force it would not be necessary to issue attachments in the event of rumored financial distress. There would be plenty of time to deliberately look into the circumstances of the debtor, and if he was nonest there could be a meeting of the creditors for the consideration of his and their best interests. If he was dishonest his property could be taken possesion of, upon the giving of a bond by the creditors until the adjudication.

We think that one of the greatest benefits which will accrue to the people under this law will be the strengthening of credit.

Each of you probably owe material men and laborers large amounts, and in turn there are large amounts are very much larger than the stock of seld goods.

It is probable that these amounts are very much larger than the stock of

It is probable that these amounts are very much larger than the stock of goods that you carry on hand.
You are, therefore, greatly interested in any law which will strengthen your credit and enable you to buy larger quantities of goods upon more favorable terms, and which will prevent a panic among your creditors, which would, perhaps, result in your destruction.
On the other hand, you are equally interested in a law which will enable you to collect the amount due, or as large a per cent thereof as possible, from the various people to whom you have sold merchandise.
The enactment of the law will, therefore, promote your best interests by strengthening the credit of those who are your debtors.
Mr. Choff. What does the bill provide in regard to preferences?
Mr. TORREY. I was asked yesterday by one of your members what would become of "confidential" creditors in the event the bill became a law, and lanswered that we hoped that the remnant of that class would be collected as specimens for dime museums. [Laughter and applause.] Preferences will be prevented; such as are received must be returned to the trustee of the bankrupt.

will be prevented; such as are received must be returned to the trustee of the bankrupt.

We do not expect that every insolvent debtor will pay 100 cents on the dollar or that every person guilty of dishonest acts will be put in the pentientiary, but we do expect that under this law estates will pay as large dividends as possible and that the great bulk of actual offenses will be punished.

Mr. Sibley. Mr. President, I believe that the Torrey bill knocks out the uncles and the aunts and the cousins forever. [Laughter.] I move that a committee be appointed to prepare suitable resolutions in indorsement of the bill.

Mr. BARNETT. I move that a vote of thanks be tendered Mr. Torrey for his able explanation of the bankrupt bill.

The motion of Mr. Barnett was agreed to.—Confectioners' Journal, Philadelphia.

THE PHILADELPHIA DRUG EXCHANGE.

Speaking of the Torrey bankrupt bill, we find the following language used by one of the oldest and most influential business organizations in the country, the Philadelphia Drug Exchange:
"Of great importance to many thousands of business men who, from various reasons, are prostrate under the burden of debt, is the subject of legalized relief through Congressional enactment. This question has, for several years, been exercising debtor and creditor in an almost equal degree.

THE LAND STREWN WITH WRECKS.

The land is strewn with financial wreckage. It is scarcely saying too much to assert that, judging from the proportion of business failures in this country, there are probably in every business street of every city therein men hopelessly involved in an indebtedness the discharge of which, without national legislation, is impossible.

Many of these unfortunates have been waiting long years for release from this bondage of the beggary of debt, hoping for relief that they may again start afresh and remove if possible a portion at least, if not all, of the weight under which they must otherwise for life remain.

Names once honored in business circles might again be known as those of energetic and enterprising men, foremost in everything just and honorable, if opportunity was afforded for them to rise again.

They ask the opportunity, and protection under that opportunity, to recover and breathe more freely once more.

THAT UNWORTHY MEN MAY BE BENEFITED IS NO ARGUMENT.

It does not weaken the argument in favor of the passage of a national bankrupt bill that, through its mereiful provisions, many unworthy debtors might reap undeserved advantages. That is doubtless unavoidable; but that it is so is no reason why the thousands who are honest in principle and honest in purpose should be sacrificed to hopeless and lifelong thraidom because the hundreds of unworthy might escape deserved punishment through the operation of the same law.

The few will, perhaps, be made no better either by relief or delay, as in any case they will not pay their debts, or any portion of them, if it is possible to avoid doing so. If they intend to defraud their creditor, they will find means to do so, as no human legislation can make them honest.

The honest debtor will pay his debts when he can, and accepts legal relief only as a means to that end, knowing full well that while law can aid him, no law can absolve him from the discharge of a moral obligation, and that under any circumstances his indebtedness remains imperative until his creditors are paid in full.

THE SUBJECT RECEIVING GRAVE ATTENTION.

THE SUBJECT RECEIVING GRAVE ATTENTION.

This subject is now receiving the attention its gravity demands, and the time seems ripe for positive action.

Creditors in the main are disposed to consider their debtors' misfortunes with kindly eyes, and are heartily cooperating with them and all interested parties in urging the speedy passage of a national bankrupt act.

This bill is strongly indorsed by the principal trade organizations of the country; and it is conceded by those who have made themselves familiar with it to possess in a superior degree the advantages of an equitable and economical distribution among creditors of a bankrupt estate; the honorable discharge of an honest bankrupt; the prompt punishment of fraudulent debtors; and a joyful escape from the legalized robbery which heretofore has in so many cases absorbed, in a large degree, the assets of a bankrupt in official fees and extortionate charges. * * *-Drug, Oil, and Paint Reporter.

THE SIMPLEST AND MOST ECONOMICAL.

THE SIMPLEST AND MOST ECONOMICAL.

The Torrey bankrupt bill is the simplest, most economical, and equitable measure that has been framed on this subject.

That it is already universally demanded by the commercial classes of the United States is evidenced by the large number of resolutions of boards of trade and other commercial bodies and petitions of individuals that have been filed in both Houses of Congress requesting its passage.—Inquirer, Philicalphia.

PREFERRED CREDITORS.

PREFERRED CREDITORS.

While there has been no widespread commercial depression in the country at large, yet the number of failures and assignments of supposed sound business firms in this and other large cities throughout the country has attracted general attention; this has been on account of the large sums due to what are denominated "preferred creditors," who are no more or less than relatives or close friends of the defaulting firm, to whom judgment is confessed in large sums for real or supposed borrowed money.

In the absence of any general bankrupt law the different States are left to adjust those amounts between bankrupt firms and their creditors, in accordance with the prevailing statutes in operation in the several States, all of which give the widest latitude for dishonest and defaulting firms to escape their just claims.

In the absence of any Federal bankrupt law among the forty-four Statesin the Union there are not two that agree in the manner in which the assets of defaulting business firms shall be adjusted and settled.

It is of the utmost importance for the general good, especially as this is entirely outside of partisan politics, for the present Congress to enact a bankrupt law in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution, so as to secure to creditors an honest an equitable distribution of the effects of defaulting business houses.

to secure to creditors an honest an equitable distribution of the effects of defaulting business houses.

The Torrey bankruptlaw is a good model for the present Congress to consider. Under this law justice is done alike to an honest bankrupt and his creditors. By its processes an honest failure means an honest and equitable distribution of the unfortunate debtor's effects among his creditorspro rata in accordance with the claims of each creditor.

As it is under the present State laws, in the absence of a general Federal law, any business man who finds himself in a financial stratecan very easily find some relative or friend whom he can make a preferred creditor on the plea that money had been loaned.

What makes many of these cases the more suspicious that premeditated fraud was intended lies in the fact that after these preferred creditors have had their alleged claims settled there is little or nothing left in the way of assets to divide among the real creditors, leaving the inference that the goods have been disposed of in a surreptitious manner with a premeditated design to defraud.

In view of the above facts, which are indorsed by the almost unanimous voice of the leading journals throughout the country, the only relief is in the passage of a uniform bankrupt law by Congress in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution that will secure a fair and equitable distribution of an honest debtor's effects and provide for the punishment of dishonest defaulters, who seek to evade the just payment of their debts by means of preferred creditors.

While the Item indorses the legal acquittance of an honest but unfortunate debtor from all claims after surrendering his effects for a private distribution among his creditors, fit by no means desires to be understood as advocating the total moral acquittance of a debtor, though not legally inble, if he at some future time acquires the means to discharge his old debts. Although not legally liable, he is still morally responsible.

A CASE IN POINT.

The editor well remembers a case in point. During the great financial panic just before the war, under a somewhat crude and vague bankrupt at, a well-known business man, carrying on a large in-lustry in this city, received a legal acquittance from the court. Several years afterward the unfortunate bankrupt became successful in business, and, sending invitations to all his old creditors to a dinner, placed on the plate of each guest an envelope containing a check for the full amount of his claim, including interest on same up to date.

In view of the general prosperity of the country at the present time, too many business failures and assignments are occurring in which preferred creditors gobble up all the assets, leaving the honest and legitimate creditors out in the cold.

While the Item does not undertake to make any special accusations, yes on many of them savor of dishonesty and fraud as to call loudly for a general bankrupt law to protect alike honest, unfortunate business men or firms and their creditors.—Item, Philadelphia.

FOR COMMERCIAL HONESTY.

Not so much in the interest of what the Board of Trade calls "commercial morality" as in the interests of that much narrower commodity, commercial honesty, should a national bankrupt law be passed by the Congress which assembles in December.

The growing commercial relations between the States with the increase in population and the development of new industries demand that the manufacturers and merchants who part with their goods to be sold in other States should be equally secure with the manufacturer and merchant creditors resident in their State.

The insecurity now felt on account of the difference in the bankrupt laws.

ident in their state.

The insecurity now feit on account of the difference in the bankrupt laws of each of the several States has a tendency to confine trade into much narer limits of each of the several States has a tendency to comine trate into little arower limits.

The preferred-creditor fraud, with its long train of rascality, will be entirely overcome by the adoption of such a law, and trade will be stimulated to an unprecedented degree.

The careful business man who hesitates now unless the standing of the purchaser is A No. 1, will be willing to run a fair business risk the moment he understands that he runs even chances with the nearby creditors of getting a pro-rate share of the assets of a bankrupt.

There are a number of vultures hanging on to the outskirts of trade who are bound to defraud the less vigilant, but this number will be reduced to a minimum as soon as the quibbles which pettifogging lawyers now make use of on account of their knowledge of the defects of the law of the State in which they practice are overcome by the passage of a law which applies equally to all the States.

The sympathy of the community can always be commanded for the honest bankrupt who is overwhelmed by misfortune, or who even makes a mistake of judgment, thus bringing ruin upon himself.

No manufacturer or merchant has a disposition to push such a one to the wall and condemn bim to a life of inactivity, and perhaps poverty, on account of that misfortume. They much rather prefer to take a pro rata of the amount due them, with the hope that future sales will make up the loss. The average American or foreigner who becomes imbued with American ideas has a perfect horror of being beaten. It wounds his pride to think that he is not a better judge of human nature. He will trust to his innate sense and take chances every time on his judgment, if he feels he has aneven show for his money with others who have credited the bankrupt.

A national bankrupt law will not only place him in that position, but it will render his chances of being "beaten," less for the simple reason that it will make the business of those who now follow up bankruptcy for a living too odious to be classed as a respectable method of making a livelihood.

Give us Judge Torrey's national bankruptcy bill by all means. It will make trade hum throughout the length and breadth of the land by inspiring confidence, which, after all, is the foundation upon which commercial prosperity is built.—Hem, Philadelphia.

DRAFTED WITH GREAT CARE.

DRAFTED WITH GREAT CARE.

* * The prejudice which has been manifested against a national bankrupty law, in so far as it is honest and not inspired by the desire to encourage dishonest debtors to cheat their creditors, has arisen in nearly every case from the experience of the country with the ill-advised, clumsy, and expensive law of 1867.

But evidently the failure of a weak law, carelessly framed, is no argument against that uniformity in the bankruptcy code which can only be gained through a national enactment. * e*

The Torrey bill was drawn with great care, and it is strong and simple enough in its provisions to meet with the general indorsement of commercial bodies in all parts of the country. It will, if passed, prevent many frauds and much of the plundering that is now possible under the forms of law.

As a measure in the interest of common honesty it is worthy of the warmest commendation and ought to become a law without difficulty.

Business men of all sections who are familiar with it indorse its provisions; and under it, if enacted, commercial transactions would have a higher tone.—News, Philadelphia.

OPINIONS OF PHILADELPHIA BUSINESS MEN.

Mr. Frederick Fraley, president of the National Board of Trade,

* 6 * Mr. Frederick Fraley, president of the National Board of Alaston Said:

"The national board has for some years favored the exercise by Congress of the sole power conferred upon it to enact a bankrupt law.

"Last year a memorial was passed favoring the Torrey bankrupt bill, and this year it was indorsed.

"The presence upon the statute books of an absolutely fair bankrupt law, such as that proposed, would go far toward preventing, in my judgment, panies and periods of financial depression. The trouble usually is not a want of money, but a want of confidence. A law, therefore, that guarantees the rights of all parties to commercial transactions would necessarily stimulate commerce and redound to the best interests of the people at large."

ALL INTERESTS WOULD BH ADVANCED.

Mr. E. S. Scranton, manager of R. G. Dun & Co. in this city, said:
"The number and character of commercial failures during the past year has emphasized the necessity for a uniform, equitable bankrupt law.
"The Torrey bill is universally conceded to be a fair measure, and it would seem that the interests of all parties to commercial transactions would be advanced by its enactment."

A BANKER COMMENDS IT.

Mr. Samuel S. Sharp, president of the Penn National Bank, said that the bank is "In favor of legislation calculated to prevent the perpetration of fraud and insure fair dealing, and hence favors the enactment of the Torrey bankrupt bill.

bankrupt bill.
"I regret to think," he said, "that the banks have not taken a very active interest in the promotion of the proposed legislation, as they are interested above and beyond other institutions in the enforcement of absolute integrity in all transactions.
"The debtors and creditors of the country need such a law, and I earnestly hope that the bill will be passed, and shall do all in my power to bring about that result."

BUSINESS SENTIMENT FAVORS IT.

Mr. Benjamin S. Janney, jr., of Janney & Andrews, remarked that the sentiment of the great masses of the business men of the country seemed to favor such a bill; that he had observed at the recent meeting of the National Board of Trade, by which the bill has been indorsed, that what little opposition there was to the bill was not from any particular section nor from any class, but was in its nature spasmodic.

PREFERENCES EVENTUALLY BENEFIT NONE.

Mr. Henry M. Steel, of E. T. Steel & Co., said:

"Our house is in favor of fair dealing between the creditors of a common debtor in the event of insolvency or wfongdoing.
"We do not think that the giving or receiving of preferences is best calculated to advance either the interests of the givers or the receivers in the long run, and, therefore, are in favor of the passage of the Torrey bankrupt bill at the present session of Congress."

PLEASED WITH THE REPRESENTATION.

PLEASED WITH THE REPRESENTATION.

Mr. Edward H. Hance, of Hance Brothers & White, expressed his views as follows: "I was one of the delegates to the Torrey bankruptcy convention at St. Louis, and was very much impressed with the honesty of the representatives of the commercial bodies composing that assembly "Judge Torrey, the author of the bill, has proven, by the work done in behalf of the commerce of the country, not only to be an able, laborious, and painstaking lawyer, but to be a man of good business judgment and fine executive ability."

READILY AND CHEAPLY ADMINISTERED.

Mr. Samuel Wagner said of the Torrey bill:

"It is a meritorious measure, has been very carefully drafted, protects alike the interests of all parties to bankruptcy cases, and, if enacted, will be, I think, readily and cheaply administered."

PROMOTED WITH RARE BUSINESS JUDGMENT.

Mr. Henry A. Fry, of Henry A. Fry & Co., wholesale grocers, who attended the conventions at St. Louis and at Minneapolis of the representatives of the commercial bodies of the country, said of them:
"They were thoroughly representative, and the delegates were anxious to secure honest legislation which should fully protect the rights of debtors and creditors in all parts of the country.
"The executive committee is composed of thoroughly representative men in all parts of the country."

INSURES EQUITABLE PROCEEDINGS.

INSURES EQUITABLE PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. William R. Tucker, speaking of the attitude of the board of trade, of which he is secretary, said:

"This body is thoroughly committed to the bankruptcy bill.
"Our members feel that in the event of financial trouble the proceedings should be conducted according to rules of equity, as provided in that bill."— Public Ledger, Philadelphia.

NATIONAL NEED OF A BANKRUPTCY LAW

The recent heavy failures which have occurred call to mind the fact that there is not yet upon the national statute books a law upon the subject of bankruptcy as contemplated by the terms of the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have the power to establish a uniform law on this vides that Congress shall have the power to establish a uniform law on this subject.

Under the present system each State has its own insolventlaws, and there must necessarily be a feeling of insecurity on the part of the merchant or manufacturer who gives credit to a distant customer. Such legislation, being confined to the limits of the State in which it is enacted, is naturally favorable to the local creditor, and in nearly every case of failure preferences are given to the home creditor, or to a relative, while the distant creditor is left to shift for himself.

What the nation needs, and what is now in the minds of many of the leading thinking besiness men of the country, is a uniform law which would afford equal protection to the local as well as to the distant creditor. This feeling has been responded to in the popular branch of Congress, which in July last passed the Torrey bankruptcy bill.—Record, Philadelphia.

AN IMPORTANT MEASURE.

A measure of prime import to business men everywhere is the Torrey bank-rupt bill. The bill has met with approval from all the commercial bodies of the country, and Judge Ezra B. Taylor, of Ohio, and other eminent jurists think it is a perfect law, and will give all the requisite relief to failing busi-ness men, with security to all at interest.—Taggert's Times, Philadelphia.

IN THE INTEREST OF MORALITY.

If anything is more necessary than another for the welfare of the country's business, it is a general bankruptcy law which shall give common security to those who represent the financial and commercial interests of the country.

At present each and every State has its bankruptcy act, no two of which are similar, and nearly all of which are especially defective in allowing the debtor to prefer his creditors. This provision is particularly pernicious, in that it directly encourages fraudulent bankruptcy and places the creditor at the mercy of his debtor.

CREDITORS AND DEBTORS NEED IT.

A national uniform act of bankruptcy is needed to protect not only the creditor class, but the honest debtor class.

The very object of such a lawis that, while it offers a measure of security to the creditor, it shall afford protection to the debtor from the oppression of the grasping, unscrupulous creditor.

It is not desirable that the business man who falls shall never have another chance to recover his position; that his old obligations shall forever bear upon him, keeping him down, and subjecting him to lifelong inactivity and overty. The spirit of the bankruptcy policy is to give him a chance to rise by taking the load of debt from his shoulders.

But it is not intended that the dishonest business man shall be tempted to fail through the facilities offered him to decide who shall or who shall not share in the division of his assets.

Under existing State laws, or those which permit preferences to be made, a premium is offered to the unscrupulous trader, and he is often enabled to get rich, not by success in legitimate business, but in dishonest failure again and grain repeated.

rich, not by success in legitimate dushiess, out in this interest and it is as fully pro-again repeated.

Judge Torrey's excellent bill allows no preferences, and it is as fully pro-tective of the debtor as of the creditor class.

As it is not in any sense a partisan bill, or one into which it is possible to inject partisanship, there is no good reason to suppose that it will not fare as well in the present House as in the former one.

It should fare better in the Senate of the new Congress than it did in the old one, for the reason that it is more greatly needed now than it was pre-

The list of bankruptcles unfortunately grows apace, and the financial and mercantile classes require that their interests shall be not only protected but encouraged. To do that is not only the province but the duty of Government.

Judge Torrey's bill is confessedly one of the very best that has been presented to Congress; it has received the indorsement of every respectable trade organization in the country, and it has met with virtually no opposition outside of Congress.

side of Congress.

In the House it has been once approved, and by both House and Senate it should be made law at the coming session.—Telegraph, Philadelphia.

PERFECTLY FAIR IN ITS TERMS.

* * * By unanimous consent the Torrey bill is conceded to be comprehensive of the subject, simple and plain in its terms, perfectly fair in its provisions, and, if enacted, promises to promote and foster credit, diminish fraud, secure the quick and inexpensive administration of bankrupts' estates, and emancipate honest insolvents.

The latest review of the various provisions of this admirable bill was undertaken by the Chamber of Commerce of Denver, and their report is emphatic in the declaration that such a law as the Torrey bill will strengthen and extend credit; will benefit wholesale and retail merchants, and be of advantage to the consumers. Their report argues as follows:

"Right-thinking creditors and debtors are alike interested, irrespective of the places of their residence or their views upon political or religious subjects, in having the giving and receiving of preferences stopped.

"Ordinarily the takers of preferences pounce down upon their unfortunate debtors, and, through threats and promises of prospective favors, or by compulsory processes, secure their assets without regard to their solvency or the rights of other creditors."—Chronicle-Telegraph, Pittsburg

INTERSTATE COMMERCE REQUIRES IT.

There is a widespread demand for the final passage of the Torrey bank-rupt bill, and it will be a shame if it does not become a law before the final adjournment of the present Congress. But then it is not a party measure, and in the unseemly struggle that is always going on among the partisans of both sides to pass and to defeat the passage of party bills, there is often no time for the consideration of meas-ures intended for general public good.

Bankrupt laws have heretofore, as a rule, been unpopular with persons in moderate circumstances financially, such laws being considered by them as intended for the benefit of the rich men who involve themselves by speculation. The Torrey bill, however, from what a leading representative says of it, is not a measure of this kind, but a good, honest bankrupt law that can be speedily and economically administered, and is destined, if passed, to prove a beneit to the poorer class of traders and business men of the country by giving them improved credit at home and abroad, since the guaranty of a fair distribution of the estate of an embarrassed dealer and the destruction of dishonest preferences against nonresident creditors will help most of those who most need to trade on credit.

Some national law on bankruptcy is certainly sadly needed, owing to the intercommerce of the States and a good law would undoubtedly improve the commercial morals of the country.—World, Reading, Pa.

WILL REDUCE COST OF SETTLEMENTS

WILL REDUCE COST OF SETTLEMENTS.

The national bankrupt law, in reducing the costs of settlements in cases of insolvency to the lowest figure consistent with ordinary business care in such cases, removes one of the gravest objections that was brought against the previous national law on this subject.

Recognizing and fortifying the right of an insolvent debtor to begin business anew and untrammeled by legal conditions after he has given his entire estate in settlement of his Hability—subject, of course, to such exemptions as his own State's laws allow him—Col. Torrey's measure commends itself to the humane spirit of the age.

The law will make fraudulent bankruptcies more difficult, preserve the rights of unfortunate debtors, cheapen adjustments, and by removing them into the stricter domain of national jurisdiction, bring about an equality in business relations not obtainable at present.

It is to be hoped that the failures of previous measures will not deter Congress from giving this carefully drawn and highly indorsed measure the favorable treatment it deserves.—Times, Scranton, Pa.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] read the other day a part of the proceedings of the Associated Wholesale Gro cers of St. Louis with reference to the bill; I offer it entire and submit that it is in all respects commendable and a forcible and proper demand for the enactment of this bill. It is as follows:

THE ASSOCIATED WHOLESALE GROCERS OF ST. LOUIS

THE ASSOCIATED WHOLESALE GROCERS OF ST. LOUIS.

The Associated Wholesale Grocers of St. Louis hereby give formal exprestion to the gratification they feel that their representative at the first and second sessions of the national convention of the representatives of the commercial bodies was made the permanent president of the organization.

They express the pride they experience by reason of the fact that the bankrupt bill as prepared by their representative and counselor was amended, adopted, and recommended to Congress for enactment, and assert their behief that the measure, when enacted, will enable honest bankrupts to be discharged, honest creditors to realize the benefits of having estates quickly and economically administered, and that it will prevent trands and furnish an adequate remedy for the punishment of dishonesty.

The association calls attention to the fact that the merchants of the country, who, while they are creditors on the one hand, are debtors on the other, and by reason of their dual position are interested in a perfectly fair law to both the debtor and creditor classes.

"Resolved, That this body hereby reasserts its belief that the enactment of an equitable, uniform, bankrupt law would give confidence to the men engaged in trade, and benefit (1) every retail merchant in the United States, because it would enlarge his credit and thereby in effect increase the capital invested in his business, and (2) every jobber in like manner, and enable him to collect at least a part of the price of goods sold.

"Resolved, That this association hereby pledges its influence and financial aid to secure the enautment by Congress of the Torrey bankrupt bill, as amended and unanimously adopted by the national convention of the representatives of the commercial bodies of the United States, at Minneapolis, on September 3 and 4, 1882.

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State are hereby carnestly petitioned to support that measure when introduced in Congress for enactment."

THE NATIONAL BANKRUPTCY ORGANIZATION.

It has been incorrectly stated that this is a bill of the rich houses. It is opposed by a few big houses. The reasons therefor are tersely given in an interview, as follows:

A REPLY BY MR. J. K. BURNHAM TO ARGUMENTS AGAINST BANK-RUPTCY LEGISLATION.

Mr. J. K. Burnham, of Burnham, Hanna, Munger & Co., of Kansas City, Mo., and Burnham, Stoepel & Co., of Detroit, Mich., was called on at his place of business in Kansas City and requested to express his views as to the desirability of nationallegislation relating to bankrupts. He said:

"My attention has been called to newspaper interviews which have recently appeared upon this subject. It seems that the credit manager of house in our line was asked, 'Would, in your opinion, the passage of the act be as injurious to the debtor as to the creditor? His reply was:

"More so; for it would prevent the creditor from helping the debtor. With its reflex action the Torrey bill would render illegal and nullify any arrangement and securities made and given within a certain period prior to bankruptcy, and so prevent an embarrassed or insolvent debtor from obtaining the aid necessary to tide him over temporary difficulties and enable him to succeed."

WILL ENABLE CREDITORS TO HELP DEBTORS.

WILL ENABLE CREDITORS TO HELP DEBTORS.

"He evidently has not read the bill, as I am sure he is able to comprehend it if he had, and I know that he would be unwilling, for the furtherance of what he conceives to be his financial interest, to misstate its provisions. The facts are that in the event of the passage of the bill a creditor would not be permitted to 'help' a debtor with the secret understanding that in the event that the help was not a success and the debtor failed, the creditor should have all of his property. It provides that liens given in good faith, and for a present consideration, shall be upheld; it does not in any sense or for any purpose propose to interfere with the ordinary course of legitimate transactions. It does forbid the giving of preferences. Its language upon that subject is as follows:

"'A person shall be deemed to have given a preference if, being insolvent or in contemplation of insolvency or bankruptcy, he has procured or suffered a judgment to be entered against himself in favor of any person or tion of this act, or (2) enable any one of his creditors to obtain a greater percentage of his debt than any other of such creditors of the same class. If a bankrupt shall have given a preference within four months before the fling of a petition, and the person receiving it or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference. It shall be voldable by the trustee and he may recover the property or its value from such person. "The facts are that the passage of this bill will put a stop to the kind of help' that this house is in the habit of extending to its debtors. That is to say, it will prevent this house, and all other houses and the home banker entertaining the same views, from waiting until their debtor has purchased a general stock of merchandise from other people and then stepping in and selzing the whole of it to pay their debt. If a debtor should get into a sinancial difficulty, it

CREDITS WILL BE EXTENDED, NOT RESTRICTED.

CREDITS WILL BE EXTENDED, NOT RESTRICTED.

"The same gentleman says that the passage of the Torrey bill would restrict credit. I notice that a competitor of his in business, in referring to that same subject, said:

"If application is made to me for credit now * * * I realize that the applicant may have given a secret mortgage, held by a competitor or a creditor in some other line. He may have given a secret promise that in the event of difficulties he will prefer a competitor or a creditor in some other line by giving him everything he has, including the goods which I am asked to sell him; or he may have foreseen financial difficulties and conceted in his own mind a scheme to hide away all of his property, with the assistance of friends, relatives, or parties to the scheme. Under existing laws I am compelled to take all of these chances.

"If the Torrey bill should be passed I will be assured that although he might have made a mortgage, promised a preference, or conceived a fraudulent scheme, he would not be able to carry it out. It follows, therefore, that so far as I am concerned, commercial credit would be very greatly extended by the passage of this measure; the confidence which would be given to me in that event would of course be imparted to others similarly situated, and just in proportion as we were willing to extend credit our business would be enlarged and our debtors would be benefited, as they would be enabled to buy goods in larger quantities, and of course upon more favorable terms.

"It seems to me that his reasoning is correct beyond question, and that credits would be extended and not restricted by the passage of the bill.

Fraud and insolvency as Acts of Bankeruptoy.

FRAUD AND INSOLVENCY AS ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY.

"The gentleman whose views I am controverting was asked:
"'What do you think of the clause in the Torrey bill making the simple ct of neglect or inability for thirty days to pay negotiable paper an act of fact of neglect or hashes, bankruptcy?"

"His reply was:
"It think it monstrous! What! make an act of bankruptcy which is not anywhere in the world even a ground for attachment? It is an extreme departure from every principle of bankruptcy law, which has always made those transactions acts of bankruptcy which show a disposition and intent on the part of the debtor to defraud his creditor, and, in my opinion, would prove in practice fruitful in losses caused by jealousy and spite. There is no other clause in the act so objectionable—so utterly indefensible as this. You might as well pass an act to compel all transactions to be on a "cashom-delivery" basis."

"Let me first deal with the gentieman's statements of facts and then I on-delivery' basis."

"Let me first deal with the gentleman's statements of facts and then I will tell you what the provisions of the bill are. In Colorado it is a ground of attachment 'that the action is brought upon an overdue promissory note, bill of exchange, or other written instrument for the direct and unconditional payment of money only, or upon an overdue book account.' In Massachusetts an attachment can be obtained by the plaintiff in a suit without even giving a bond. I do not seek to justify these laws, but I simply state the facts to show the want of information on the part of the credit manager.

even giving a bond. I do not seek to justify these laws, but I simply state the facts to show the want of information on the part of the credit manager.

"The gentleman has evidently been too busy dealing out credits to examine any bankruptcy law, including the proposed one. His statement, 'acts of bankruptcy which show a disposition and intention on the part of the debtor to defraud his creditors,' is only a partial statement of what constitute acts of bankruptcy under the English bankruptcy act, what did constitute acts of bankruptcy under the eld bankruptcy law, or what it is proposed shall constitute acts of bankruptcy under the Torray bill. That is to say, acts of bankruptcy in general terms constitute acts the doing of which, or the failure to do which, amounts to a fraud upon creditors with reference to the property of the debtor, or acts in relation thereto which indicate that he has become insolvent and has neglected to meet his financial obligations. Under the English bankruptcy law, if a debtor gives notice that he is going tosuspend payments it is an act of bankruptcy. Under present laws a debtor who does not pay his note within three days after maturity may be sued by the holder of it, although it may be for a trifling amount, and the result of such suit may be to precipitate litigation which will result in a struggle between his creditors and bring about his financial failure.

"Under the proposed bill adebtor can not be sued because of suspending payments of his commercial paper unless it is for or aggregates over $500, and has remained unpaid or unrenewed for at least thirty days, and he is insolvent, and even then it is a matter of choice by the creditors as to whether they will or will not institute proceedings as in any other case. The holder of the paper can not of himself institute proceedings, but must be secure the cooperation of at least two other creditors and the agregate of his and their unsecured claims must be $500 or over: if the creditors of the debtor are less than twelve in numb and if honest will be entitled to a discharge, not as 'subjects for charity and humane consideration,' or as the result of 'generous, Christian impulses,' but because the Constitution of the country in which we live provided for, and our statesmen passed, a humane law providing for such a discharge to those who are honest.

"The old law contained this provision, except that the time was fourteen instead of thirty days. It did not prove to be 'an act to compel all transactions to be on a 'cash on delivery' basis.' The results feared by the gentleman are therefore unwarranted, either by the experience of the past or the provisions of the Torrey bill.

A LARGE PART OF FAILURES ARE NOT FRAUDULENT.

"The newspapers give the views of the credit man of the same house, and among other things he says:

"It is an established fact, known at least among credit men, that a large part of all the failures are fraudulent, and with the aid of a law discharging the bankrupt the temptation to fraud, already great, would be so increased as to be irresistible to many.

"The statement that a large part of all the failures are fraudulent is not justified by our experience. Reported statistics show that only one-fourteenth of the failures last year were fraudulent. If it is true that a large part of all the failures are fraudulent, there is evidently great necessity for a law designed, as the Torrey bill is, to punish fraud and prevent its perpetration. Something over 95 per cent of all the people who engage in business sooner or later fail. It certainly cannot be truthfully said that 'a large part' of all of them are fraudulent in their nature. He continues:

"These men ought, in the interest of honesty and safety in business, to be kept out of trade, as the community is better off without them."

"This, we suppose, is the kind of 'charity and humane consideration' that would presumably arise out of the 'Christian impulses' of the men who conduct that house.

HONEST INSOLVENTS OUGHT TO BE DISCHARGED.

"The men conducting the house in question have a few imitators. The credit man of one of them in speaking upon the subject said:

"A bankruptcy law will precipitate upon the country more or less defunct merchants who have from incapacity, dishonesty, or some other good and sufficient cause, been laid on the shelf and will there remain unless resuscitated by a law which will free them from existing debts. Such a class are a detriment to the country and the business community. They should not be brought to life.'

"The above is the statement of the 'Christian impulses' of one of the class

"The above is the statement of the 'Christian impulses' of one of the class of men who, under the present imperfect State laws, sit in judgment first and last upon over 8 per cent of the men who have promoted the enterprises and conducted the commerce of the country. The proposed law will deprive this class of gentry of their ability to say whether men who have falled ought to be 'laid on the shelf' or 'resuscitated.'

"The Torrey bill, under very careful restrictions to prevent its provisions being taken advantage of by dishonest debtors, grants to honest debtors the right of discharge, to the end that they may the better provide for their families, educate their children, and follow the occupations for which they are best suited. We think that the best interests of the whole people would be better served by the findings of an honest judiciary as to the rights of the individual applicant rather than by the dictatorial rule established by these credit men, who have thus shown to the world the narrowness of their views and the fact that they are actuated not by the rule of humanity, but by the rule of the 'almighty dollar.'

THE POSITION OF A FEW BIG HOUSES UNMASKED.

THE POSITION OF A FEW BIG HOUSES UNMASKED.

THE POSITION OF A FEW BIG HOUSES UNMASKED.

"The position of these people is very effectively unmasked, not by a credit manager, or a credit man, or a collector, but by the head of an opposing house. He is reported to have said:

"The impression I have is that the passage of the Torrey bill will not from a selfish standpoint promote the financial interests of all the big houses, but that it will benefit the people at large. The reason for thinking that it will not redound to the financial interests of big houses is that they now have equipped themselves with all the facilities for enforcing collections, if need be, and are therefore better enabled to secure preferences than their less fortunate competitors or associate creditors.

"In speaking further he said:

"Equipped as we are, I think it probable that we are able to collect a larger percentage of our old debts than we would be in the event of the passage of the proposed bankruptcy law. If that measure were passed all of our honest insolvent debtors would be at liberty to take the benefits of it and secure their discharge, after making a full surrender of their property over and above their exemptions.

"His answer to the inquiry as to whether he thought the passage of the bill would prove a calamity to the country or be in militation of the best interests of the people was:

"No, sir; I do not think so. My judgment is that the only valid objection to the passage of such an act as the one proposed is a selfish one; that the present laws from a financial standpoint better suit a few houses than a bankrupt law would. "Do not understand from my statement that I am opposed to the passage of this bill. On the contrary I am in favor of its enactment by Congress, because I believe, all in all, that whatever is for the best interests of the great mass of the people must, in the end, be for our very best interests."

SHOULD HONEST INSOLVENTS WHO CAN NOT PAY CONTINUE TO OWE?

should honest insolvents who can not pay continue to owe?

"The credit man of another house, which imitates the one in question, began a recent newspaper review as follows:

"Though I have not had sufficient time to give to the bill a careful and thorough reading, from such an investigation as I could make it occurs to me that the intricacles involved, the large amount of machinery to be set in motion, the great number of officers to be created, the vast amount of litigation and delay incident to such a law, must be disastrous to the creditor. " " Without being able, therefore, to discuss the bill before Congress for a national bankruptcy system, I must say that I am decidedly opposed to any bankrupt law whatever."

"Please note how well this gentleman was equipped to discuss a great public question and to give information to the public concerning it. He continued:

continued:

"'No person should be relieved from his legitimate contracts in any way other than by their fulfillment; in other words, those who contract to pay and fail should continue to owe. All of the exceptions to this just and honorable rule can, I think, be included in the list of those who are rendered unable to keep their obligations by the act of God or the public enemy, and of the greater number of those who fail in business this exception is certainly too small for consideration, and they may be counted as legitimate subjects for charity and humane consideration instead of bankruptcy laws: and, by the way, I know of no instances where the people have not most generously responded in such cases, and I think it may be said that all such can with safety be left to the generous Christian impulses of the people."
"I suggest that this man, presumably of 'Christian impulses,' ought to have lived in the dark ages, when it is said that debtors having several crediters were cut to pieces and divided among their creditors, or sold into slavery, or, later on, when there was a debtors' prison with all of its untold horrors.

wy, or, later on, when there was a debtors' prison with all of its untold horrors.

"The man who is thus without knowledge of the bill in question, and who can thus give impromptu opinions to the public, continues:

"A large majority of the class of debtors who are to be benefited by a bankrupt act are the very people who have demonstrated the fact that they are no longer entitled to the confidence of the business world, and there is an good reason why they should be legislated back into a possible position for which they have shown themselves wholly incompetent.

"Statistics show, as before stated, that something over 95 per cent of all the men who go into business sooner or later fail. This wise clerk of this house would therefore have over 95 per cent of the men who go into business kept out if they could not run the gauntlet of 'generous Christian impulses' exercised by their creditors.

HONEST PEOPLE SHOULD COOPERATE.

HONEST PROPLE SHOULD COOPERATE.

"For my own part (said Mr. BURNHAM continuing) I consider it right for honest people to cooperate; not only right, but in the long run profitable on a dollar and cent basis. It is too often the case under present laws that the honest men fight about who shall have all that has been found, while the dishonest make away with the bulk of the estate.

"There ought to be a law under which the honest debtors and the honest creditors could help each other and bring the rogues to punishment. I believe the Torrey bill will bring about these results, and hence hope Congress will pass it."—Kansae City Star.

CONFIDENCE, NOT MONEY, IS NEEDED.

It has been said that this bill would destroy credit; it is not true; it would promote credit. I submit a memorial which states the case admirably, as follows:

A memorial calling attention to the present of the country. ent depressed financial condition

To The United States Senate:

A memorial calling attention to the present depressed financial condition of the country.

To The United States Senate:

Your memorialist, the National Convention of the Representives of the Commercial Bodies of the United States, respectfully calls the attention of your honorable body to facis as follows:

The financial affairs of the country are in a perilous condition. Business men in all of the States of the Union are apprehensive that there will be a panic. Citizens in general are alarmed at the outlook. Values of property are de-reasing. Persons, firms, and corporations are daily failing, whose assets are largely in excess of their liabilities.

There is but a single cause for all of the above conditions, and that is a want of confidence. As a result of that single cause money is being with drawn from circulation and the evils which are following and are likely to continue to follow are innumerable. There is but a single cause money may or may not avert the danger as there is no limit to the amount of money that can and will be hoarded so long as the single cause, want of confidence, continues. Such single remedy is the enactment of a law by Congress as provided by the resides, will be preserved and may be enforced.

Your memorialist further respectfully represents that confidence can not be readily restored under existing laws because shey do not contain adequate provisions pursuant to which the creditors of a common debtor may meet, counsel together, and render to him the assistance he needs, and extend him such ravors as may be in his and their best interests. State laws encourage the selfish hashinct of self preservation, and as a result creditors seek preference, and, falling therein, endeavor to secure them by compulsory process withour regard to whether the debtor's property is always levied upon under compulsory process to pay the amount claimed and exist, and is sold at sacrifice sales, so that no man can safely say that he is solvent if he but becomes the subject of attack from his creditors who debtors, and men with property do not hoard it, and thereby stop the wheels of commerce.

Your memorialist further represents that the Torrey bankrupt bill makes ample and explicit provisions for the meeting of creditors of a common debtor to make a fair compromise, arrange an honorable extension of the time within which he may pay his debts, or appoint a trustee to make an equitable division of the assets; the discharge of honest insolvents who have made a full disclosure of their affairs and a complete surrender of their property; the adjustment by arbitration of matters in controversy; the dissolving of enforced liens in the event an adjudication in bankruptcy is had within four months thereafter; the allowance to bankruptcy officers of moderate fees for their services and the payment of them in such manner as to expedite the administration of bankrupt estates; the restoration of confidence at present and the prevention of the loss of confidence in the future by the proper administration of justice and the perpetuation of integrity in the transactions between debtors and creditors, the grand aggregate of which constitutes the commerce of the world.

Your memorialist, in view of the foregoing, respectfully petitions for the immediate consideration and passage of that measure on behalf of commercial, industrial, and other bodies of all parts of the country; hundreds of thousands of men whose capital consists in part of credit justly founded upon confidence, and whose prospects are likely to be blighted, and property swept away as a result of a continuance of the present conditions, and a million or more of United States citizens who have been beggared and are now compelled to labor in menial places because there is not a bankrupt law in force providing for their relief, as contemplated by the Constitution of mapeies to incorrect the contemplated by the Constitution of country.

CLIPPINGS FROM TEXAS NEWSPAPERS

The Texas papers have considered the subjectfully. I quote a few extracts from them, as follows:

A UNIFORM AND PERMANENT LAW.

Among the bills pressing for final passage before the close of the present session of Congress is that commonly known as the Torrey bankruptcy bill. The wide support which the bill has received from commercial bodies and leading business men throughout the country has been from time to time noted. Nevertheless it has encountered some strong opposition in and out of Congress.

Its opposers, as a rule, however, do not dispute the general wisdom of some equitable and economical system of bankruptcy, uniformly and expeditiously applicable in all the States of the Union. Most of them agree, indeed, that such a law is greatly neened.

Them, as their objections to the pending bill relate only to certain of its details, they might well be asked to assist in amending such objectionable features or desist from their opposition.

PHILOSOPHY OF BANKRUPT LAWS.

PHILOSOPHY OF BANKRUPT LAWS.

Largely viewed, the subject of bandruptcy is a deeply interesting study for the merchant, the financier, the lawyer, and the statesman.

The modern theory of the law of bankruptcy in civilized countries contemplates the insolvent debtor as for the time a commercially dead person whose estate vests in his creditors for the purpose of a reliable division of its among them. Then, cleared of his remains as to both assets and labilities, he may rise again and begin life a new man, free to pursue any honest avocation and accumulate property.

The primitive theory of bankruptcy was very different. This regarded insolvent indebtedness as a personal crime involving forfeiture of liberty and even of life. Thus the ancient law of Rome gave the creditors of a declared bankruptcy the option of making diividends out of his carcass or of selling him and his family into slavery.

and his family into slavery.

But for the credit of humanity this horrible savagery was for the most part only theoretical, and gradually the theory itself gave way to provisions under which an insolvent debtor by a surrender of property could preserve his

PRIMITIVE BARBARITY.

Still somehow the primitive notion of default in the debtor as a personal crime for which some terrible explation may be exacted has not become ut terly obsolete in modern times.

The popular novelist recognizes it in the frequent practice of depicting a wealthy, avaricious, but detestable creditor winding up a hopelessly embarrassed creditor in his meshes and finally proposing to accept the sacrific of the victim's pretty daughter by way of compensation.

The same notion seems to crop out in arguments against any provision for voluntary recourse to bankruptcy. These arguments consciously or unconsciously presume that the insolvent debtor is a fraudulent debtor who deserves to be dealt with as an actual or intending thief.

Of course such cases are possible, and as exceptional instances are sured occur, for the present chaos of bankruptcy law under a bewildering multitude of statutes confined to State boundaries is only too well calculated to furnish facilities for that kind of insolvency.

But in the complex relations of the commercial world creditor and debtor, seller and buyer, are coming to stand to each other more and more as recipions.

rocal and cooperating factors.

The bulk of current commercial transactions is not on a cash but a credit

RECIPROCALLY DEPENDENT.

If in one aspect the retail dealer is debtor to the wholesale dealer, in another angect the former represents the latter as a sort of broker selling on commission—at a profit; that is, to compensate him for his intermediary service. And likewise with the wholesale dealer and the manufacturer. They are all in one or another direction debtors and creditors. They are all in one or another direction debtors and creditors. They are all of another direction debtors and creditors. They are all of a service of some easy, speedy, and cheap method of settlement and rehabilitation through bankruptcy.

It is sound public policy to provide such a method and to maintain it as a uniform, universal, and permanent system.

The virtue of the system would be seen in reducing hazards of business, in toning up commercial confidence, in encouraging sincerity and straightforwardness between dealers, in lessening the prices of commodities to consumers, and last, but not least, in demolishing or circumventing the pitfalls and snares which the present choatic situation affords for fraudulent preference, collusion, and evasion.—News, Dallas.

A PETITION FROM DALLAS.

Judge R. D. Coughanour, of Dalias, is having signed a petition addressed to Congress for the passage of the Torrey bankrupt bill.

The signatures here include representatives of every branch of commerce, judges of the supreme and district courts, attorneys, and all the county officials.

The memorial to Congress accompanying the petition sets forth the following reasons for the passage of the measure:

I. The Constitution confers on honest insolvents a right to have a bankrupt law enacted.

 6. Fraud will be prohibited, and such persons as commit wrongs will be punished.
 7. Dishonest and insolvent debtors will be required to make a complete showing and a full surrender of their property.
 8. Creditors having claims of equal merits against bankrupt estates will receive pro rata dividends.
 9. The coercion of debtors by their large creditors and of large by little creditors will be prevented.
 10. Voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy are necessary in the best interests of debtors and creditors.
 11. The estates of insolvents and dishonest persons will be quickly, economically, and equitably divided, without "fear, favor, or affection."
 12. The New Testament was revised. The present bill is an improvement on all former bankrupt laws.

 The bill makes ample provision for the discharge of honest insolvents from their debts over and above the amount paid in dividends from their estates, except such as are contracted in a fiduciary capacity.

- then their rights and do away with the incentives for wrongdoing, and to deter persons from so doing.

 It is not an infrequent practice among houses, and particularly among those situated in different states which sell goods in a common territory to mload their weak customers on other houses, and when they have secured a stock of goods secure a preference and thereby collect dollar for dollar of their indebtedness.

 For example, a house in A has a customer in X who has fallen behind, and
- a stock of goods secure a preference and thereby confect doffar for doffar of their indebtedness.

 For example, a house in A has a customer in X who has fallen behind, and could not upon forced liquidation pay 50 cents on the dollar. The customer goes to the house in B to purchase goods, and gives as reference the house with whom he formerly dealt. In reply to the letter of inquiry the house in A says that the customer formerly dealt with it and is considered honest and industrious. The new customer is thereupon given a line of credit. When the stock has been replenished the creditor takes a bill of sale at an estimated valuation of the property and cancels its indebtedness. If the customer is able to secure a compromise at a small figure the A house considerately furnishes the cash, and then appoints the customer, the manager of the business, sells the goods at their real value, and as a result has realized enough to reimburse it for the original amount and for the advance made to compromise with the B creditor, who, in fact, furnished the merchandise to make good the losses of the A house in previous years.

 It is an unfortunate fact that this effect is reached in various forms all over the country from day to day.

VOLUNTARY AND INVOLUNTARY BANKRUPTCY.

A number of national bankruptcy bills have been introduced in Congress. The measure to which the country at large has given the most attention and which seems to be the only one which is comprehensive of the subject is known as the Torrey bill.

The friends of that measure advocate both the voluntary and involuntary system of bankruptcy. The enemies for the most part do not array themselves as entirely opposed to the bill, but favor, as they say, simply a voluntary law.

- selves as entirely opposed to the bill, but favor, as they say, simply a voluntary law.

 The difference as defined by that measure between a voluntary and an involuntary law, so far as the bankrupt is concerned, is simply determined by whether he files his own petition or whether it is filed by his creditors; after the petition is filed the rights and responsibilities of both classes of bankrupts are identical.

 When an adjudication is made all preferences which have been given by the bankrupt within four months, and all attachments which have been filed against him within that time, are by virtue of the adjudication annulled. Under the involuntary system the creditors can commence proceedings under very careful restrictions, and thus prevent many fraudulent dispositions of their debtor's property.

 If there was only a voluntary system the would-be bankrupt would deliberately prepare for bankruptcy and his creditors would be helpless.

- The purpose of those who advocated only the voluntary law seems to be to curry favor with the so-called debtor classes and to cover up their opposition to the whole system of legislation as provided by the Federal Constitution in a seeming struggle to secure special favors for the debtor class.

 We believe that the passage of a law purely in the interest of the debtor classes would be in a great measure destructive of their financial interests. As an illustration, suppose that in the fancied interests of the debtors all laws for the collection of debts were repealed; the result would be the curaliling of credits and that great numbers of persons would be financially ruined; if in turn the same laws were rendered less effective the same result would be felt in a modified degree and goods would command a higher price because of the increase of the hazard of business.

 It therefore follows that the passage of a law solely in the interest of the debtors, or thought even to be so, would curtail their credits, force many of them to the wall and others out of business, and raise the price of goods to the consumers.
- the consumers.

 In the popular acceptation of the term, the debtor class means the deserving poor, while the creditor class refers to the rich and opulent. For the purposes of the discussion concerning bankruptcy legislation these terms are most deceptive. 6, the railroads of the country owe to the bondholders, merchants, manufacturers, and laborers an aggregate indebtedness of $5,758,541,542, or about six times the amount of the national debt; the banks and trust companies owe an aggregate amount of $2,529,256,699, a considerable part of which is the savings of the poor classes.

 It therefore seems apparent that the opposition to bankruptcy legislation, disguised under the plea for the debtor class, is in behalf of the great railroad corporations and the banks and trust companies of the country and not in the interests of the deserving poor.

 In general terms, those who are debtors are in turn creditors and for the most part have their entire financial well-being pending between the desire of their creditors to be paid and the willingness of their debtors to settle their accounts.

- Every man so situated is of necessity an advocate, not of a partial and in-complete system of bankruptcy, but of one which is comprehensive of the

- sibilities both as a debtor and as a creditor.

 Bankruptcy laws are a part of the laws of the more important and of some of the insignificant governments of the world, and now that it seems probable that we are to have one it is extremely desirable that it should be fair alike to creditors and debtors, in order to become a part of the permanent laws of the country.

SIGNIFICANT CONCERT OF ACTION.

- Commercial bodies in all parts of the country are acting with significant concert on the subject of a national bankruptcy law, and have unanimously indorsed what is known as the Torrey bill, now pending in Congress under circumstances that seem eminently favorable to its passage.

 The last bankrupt law of Congress was so victous in its structure and in some of the practices which it instituted or sanctioned that it was swept bodily from the statutes in deference to public opinion.

 Nevertheless there are many reasons why a fairly constructed and properly guarded national bankruptcy law should be enacted by Congress and remain in permanent force for the benefit alike of debtor interests and creditor interests through all the vicissitudes, the fluctuations, and the extended of commerce.

- remain in permanent tores for the benefit white of decore interests and creditor interests through all the vicissitudes, the fluctuations, and the exigencies of commerce.

 Under the Constitution of the United States only Congress is competent to enact uniform laws on the subject of bankrupticles throughout the United States, and the several States are not allowed to release debtors from the obligation of contracts.

 The several States, however, have their insolvent laws, by no means uniform, and in too many instances permitting and facilitating precipitate and ruinous attachments, unfair preferences, or fraudulent assignments.

 Public policy justifies the discharge of honest insolvents from indebtedness beyond the amount of their assets surrendered for equitable distribution among creditors. It equally justifies the restraint of dishonest solvents from devices for evading such a distribution.

 It is claimed for the Torrey bill that it is well adjusted to both of these purposes, and from the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House the claim seems to be entirely tenable. The involuntary features of the bill do not apply to agricultural pursuits, and it is believed that the mercantile interests of Texas, as well as of the other States, would be in various ways advanced and protected by the adoption of such a measure.—News, Dallas.

A NATIONAL BANKRUPT LAW.

- A NATIONAL BANKKUPT LAW.

 The Federal Constitution provides that Congress may enact uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcies. This power has been exercised but three times since the adoption of that instrument.

 The first law was enacted in 1800, the second in 1841, and the third in 1867; the first two were not long-lived, but the last was in force eleven years. All of them were emergency laws, and were, respectively, repeated when the emergency had passed.

 The Torrey bankruptcy bill wasdrafted by the St. Louis attorney, Judge Jay L. Torrey, and was named after him and promulgated by a national bankruptcy convention, which met in Minneapolis in the fall of 1889. It was passed by the last House of Representatives as a business, and not a political or sectional measure, and was reported for enactment by the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate; it, however, failed of consideration, because of its position upon the Calendar.

 Our information is that it will be submitted to the next Congress, and again urged for passage.
- our information is that it will be submitted to the next congress, and again urged for passage.

 At the beginning of the last Congress there were a large number of bill is introduced upon this subject, but the one in question seems by universal accord to be the best bill which has ever been presented to Congress or the country, and has therefore become the successor of all other measures upon the subject.

- Introduced upon this subject, but the one in question seems by universal accord to be the best fall which has ever been presented to Congress or the country, and has therefore become the successor of all other measures upon the subject.

 Bankruptcy laws have been, in one form or another, parts of the codes of all civilized nations from almost time immemorial, and we in the United States have, since the repeal of the old law in 1878, presented the singular spectacle of being agreat commercial nation without a law of uniform application for the whole country for the administration of the estates of those who have suffered misfortune, and for the discharge of honest insolvents.

 The imperfect provisions and the maladministration of the old law have left unpleasant recollections of that measure, and, as a result, there is here and there opposition to the enactment of the new law.

 There seems no room to doubt that the proposed law has cured the defects of the old one; at any rate, it is an honest movement with that end in view, and the indications all point to the fact that the proposed law is in every respect a meritorious measure.

 In connection with the thought as to whether it is possible to improve upon the old law and to have a bankruptcy code which will really promote the best interests of the whole country, we recall the fact that the national Constitution has been amended; that the constitutions of all of the older States have from time to time been overhanied, and that the stational Constitution which has been from time to time amended and revised.

 In addition, we recall the fact that even the translation of the New Testament has not escaped a revision at the hands of the Christian world.

 We of the West are interested in almost endless ways in the enactment of a just and equitable law upon this subject. Many of our best citizens have in the development of legitimate enterprises become bankrupted, but under the inadequate provisions of our laws, which are quite as good as those of other States, have not therefore feels more keenly the harhship of not being able to secure a discharge from his indebtedness and an opportunity to continue the exercise of his energy and ability in the direction of promoting his own best interests and incidentally those of the State.

There is in some quarters a feeling that it is right, in event of a failure, for a debtor to apply his entire estate to the payment of home creditors, but we think that the better rule is that honesty is the best policy in the long run, and that the giving and receiving of preferences is pernicious and not for the best interests of the credit of our mercantile people, either at home or in other States. other State or in other States. A very careful examination of the bill in question and the debates in Congress when it was before the House of Representatives at the time of its pasage by that body, and a consideration of the principles involved, leads instibilly to the conclusion that the passage of the bill will greatly advance the best interests of the West, and we therefore express the earnest hope that the measure will become a law during the next Congress.—Sun, Cheyenne, Wyo. (copied by the Record, Del Rio, Tex.).

BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION.

The subject of bankruptcy legislation is one of the important measures which will engage the attention of the present Congress. We noted the struggie in the last Congress over a bill upon this subject, which was named the Torrey bankruptcy bill. It was passed in the House of Representatives by a large majority, but did not become a law because it was not reached for consideration upon the Sanata Calendar.

It was passed in the House or Representatives by a large majority, but did not become a law because it was not reached for consideration upon the Senate Calendar.

The bill as above was the product of an agitation in behalf of legislation to secure the discharge of honest people who are overburdened with debt, and to bring about the prompt and cheap administration of the estates of those who are unfortunate enough to fail.

It has been indorsed by the leading industrial and business bodies all over the country as a measure which is not in any sense selfish or sectional and as designed to promote the best interests of the whole people.

The press has very generally credited the movement with being in the right direction, having an honest purpose and as likely to succeed.

The bill provides among other things that the exemptions to a bankrupt shall be the same as those provided by the laws of the State in which he lives, which, under the Texas law, exempts his homestead.

It further provides that the debtor, if honest, shall be discharged from the amount of his indebtedness which is not paid by dividends from his estate.

This provision alone is worth the trial of the bill, for how many honest debtors, after giving up their all, have been prevented by their past bankruptcy from honestly engaging in business under their name, being compelled to resort to subterfuge, which reacts morally against his better nature.

It also contains provisions which seem designed to secure fair dealing, not only to persons having transactions together, but on the part of bankruptcy

The hope is expressed that the bill will be speedily enacted and that it will rove a success.—Industrial Educator, Forth Worth, Tex.

BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION DEMANDED.

It is self-evident that the study of party policy in the principal political uestions need not so occupy the attention of Congress as to prevent the incoduction and forwarding of measures for judicial and administrative retroduction and forwarding of measures for judicial and administrative reform in various respects.

There are many committees besides the two or three which usually attract most attention, and there are many members who, as far as legitimate public duties are concerned, have plenty of time to study other questions than those which are on the surface.

There are future reputations to be made by men who can not expect to be prominent in the most prominent questions, but who may secure the passage of legislation suiting the demands of business and otherwise sure to be gratefully received.

Among other subjects often talked of and not extend the manufacture of the production of the subjects of the production of the subjects.

prominent in the most prominent questions, but who may secure the passage of legislation suiting the demands of business and otherwise sure to be gratefully received.

Among other subjects often talked of and not settled there is the bankruptcy law. The authority of Congress is express on this subject. There were a couple of plans before the last Congress, the Torrey bill being most discussed, in and out of Washington.

It is not enough to indge any bill by the obvious need of the country coupled with the profession that it supplies relief. Does it make the transaction of business as prompt, cheap, and equitable to all parties as diligent study can make it, and is the bill as plain to ordinary understanding as ought to be a law which business men must have some understanding of in order to go safely? This last is even a necessary point.

No man is required to commit naturally criminal acts; hence it matters little how complex the criminal law may be so that it be just and sure, for the simple rule is that a man may avoid wrongdoing; but when one goes into business, involuntary bankruptcy being a contingency without a wrong intention, it is plain that the law required is one which ordinary understanding should master and remember without trouble.

There has been an ocean of talk on the need of a general bankruptcy law. Many bills could be drawn which would provide in some way for equity; but the people do not want any process that will eat up the estate in determining how to divide it.

They want a simple law that will protect every creditor in a fair share of the assets, and protect fair dealers from being forced into bankruptcy when it is unnecessary in order to secure a rightful claim.

They want the best and simplest law which good sense and honest purpose and legal acumen, advised by business experience, can make, and they want it from this Congress at this session.

PROGRESSIVE VIEWS ON THE SUBJECT.

PROGRESSIVE VIEWS ON THE SUBJECT.

There is one transcendental beauty about the San Antonio Express, and that is its grit. When it makes a stand itstands there, and there is no power on earth that can make it either move on or sit down.

When the Torrey bankrupt bill was first formulated the Express said it was a good thing and would fill a long-felt want. Several of the Texas delegation in Congress said nay, but the Express don't care a tannale for that; it just digs its fingers into the adobe veneering and refuses to budge. The Post is inclined to agree with the Express. The bill has been studied carefully, line by the best lawyers regardless of party, and they say that it is just what is needed. The business men of the country have analyed it and placed the stamp of their approval upon it. Doubtless it is not perfect; few things created by man are, but the laws of this great country, unlike those of the Medes and Persians, are subject to amendment.

Almost any kind of a national bankrupt law would be an improvement on the present condition of affairs, and with due deference to the Texas mem-bers of Congress, the Post opines that the business men of the country are apt to know more about their own business and its needs than do the politi-

AN UNADULTERATED BUSINESS BILL.

The passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill by the House was, with the exception of the tariff bill, the first important business measure affecting the whole country to which it has given attention.

If the Senate will only hold up on its partisan legislation long enough to pass this bill as adopted by the House, the nation will have derived the benefit of one good bill during this long session of political stump speaking.

No State stands more in need of a bankrupt law than Texas, which has the crudest and most unfair form of assignment law that could have been conceived. It might properly be entitled a law to enable a bankrupt to protect his friends and swindle obnoxious creditors.

The Torrey bill is carefully drawn. It has been approved, in its main features, by the ablest lawyers North and South.

It was carefully considered by the Judiciary Committee of the House and a strong report was made in its favor.

As a business necessity it has been indorsed by all of the great commercial exchanges and chambers of commerce North and South.

There was no politics in it. The bill was unadulerated business.

The lawyer who has read that bill through section by section and line by line, as it was submitted to the House with the committee amendments, can not deny that for its purpose it is as nearly perfect as any bill that could have been formed.—Express, San Antonio.

ADMIRABLY FRAMED MEASURE.

This paper favors a national bankrupt act which will place all creditors in all parts of the Union on a footing of equality with those in a State where the bankruptcy occurs, if it will not eat up the insolvent estate with court costs and lawyers fees.

costs and lawyers fees.

The hostily to the national bankrupt act, which expired in 1878, arose from the fact that settlements were too long delayed, and court officials gobbled most of the assets converted into cash.

The bill is admirably framed to avoid these objections, to give the honest of the assets of the second of

After reading the whole bill as it passed the House, the Times agrees with Judge Taylor that "it is remarkable for the terseness of its style, the fairness to both debtor and creditor of its provisions, and the expedition and economy it will necessitate in the settlement of estates."

The Times hopes that the Texas Congressmen who have been opposing this bill will withdraw their opposition.

The country needs it. The commercial bodies of every section ask for it. It has the approval of the ablest lawyers regardless of party.— Times, San Antonio.

I find an article in the Galveston Daily News which gives a very short but explicit statement of the bill and the report of the Judiciary Committee of the last House; it is as follows:

BANKRUPTCY LEGISLATION—OATES' SUBSTITUTE FOR THE TORREY BILL, OF LAST SESSION—CHANGES THAT HAVE BEEN MADE TO DISARM ADVERSE CRITI-CISM DIRECTED AGAINST THE ACT.

WASHINGTON, July 18.

WASHINGTON, July 18.

There are constant inquiries from all over the country in regard to the status of the bankrupt bill introduced in the last Congress, and falling to pass both Houses then was introduced in this Congress. The matter is specially interesting to lawyers and men in embarrassed circumstances. In compliance with the conclusion reached by the Judiciary Committee to report a substitute in the pending bankruptcy bills to the House, Col. Oates has filed the substitute and the report of the committee.

The substitute is the Torrey bankruptcy bill minus the section contained in it upon the subject of loaning money. The chapter on bankrupts has been transposed so as to be the first chapter of the bill instead of the third, as formerly. A number of the sections of the bill have been transposed so as to be topically instead of alphabetically arranged. Quite a number of friendly amendments were made to the original bill so that it is now in better form than ever before. The committee held a large number of meetings to consider the subject, and Judge Torrey, by invitation, sat with it during those meetings. It seems that those opposed to bankruptcy legislation, as well as those favorable to it, gave to the bill the benefit of their wisdom upon the theory that if there was to be a bill passed it ought to be as perfect as possible.

well as those favorable to it, gave to take the standard to be as perfect as possible.

Judge CUlberson criticised the bill severely at the time it was passed by the House in the last Congress on account of the provision it made for the payment of salaries to referees from the Federal Treasury. At that time the bill provided that a number of referees, not to exceed the number of the members of Congress, might be appointed if the business of the bankruptey courts required, each to be paid a one-thousand-dollar salary per annum; the Government to be reimbursed for this expenditure by the payment of 1 per cent on the net assets of each estate distributed.

The foregoing pian has been modified in the substitute so that the percent age, instead of being paid into the Federal Treasury, will be paid upon the conclusion of each case directly to the referee. By this means it will be noted that each referee will be interested in the prompt and economical administration of the estate, as the time of the payment is identical with the date of the final settlement and the amount of the compensation is to be computed upon the net results. As a companion piece to the above amendment there is one striking out the limitation as to the number of referees, so that now any number may be appointed without creating any charge on the Federal Treasury.

The section relating to the title to property was amended by providing that appraisers should be appointed for the estate, and that the personal property should not be sold for less than 75 per cent of its appraise value, unless the sale was first reported to and approved by the court. The sale of all real and mixed property shall be reported to and approved by the court, after notice to creditors, before title shall pass.

The referees under the old laws were appointed by the President; under the Torrey bill, as introduced by Col. OATES, they were to be appointed by the circuit court. An amendment was made by which they will be appointed by the didges of the district court under whose direction they will perform the Torrey bill, as introduced by Col. OATES, they were to be appointed by the judges of the district court under whose direction they will be appointed by the judges of the district court under whose direction they will be appointed by the judges of the district court under whose direction they will perform their duties.

The section defining acts of bankruptcy has been amended by the insertion of a proviso that the provision relating to the failure to secure the release of property which has been levied upon for $600 or over until three days before the time of sale may be continued until a petition is filed. The suffering, while insolvent, of an execution for $500 or over to be returned no property found shall not be an act of bankruptcy, provided the amount is paid before the petition is filed. The act relating to the nonpayment or renewal of a note for $500 or over within thirty days after maturity has been modified so that proof must be made of insolvency in order to secure an adjudication, and in addition the default must continue until the petition is filed. It is said by the friends of the bill that these modifications disarm the criticisms which have been heretofore directed at this section. The section relating to who may become voluntary bankrupts has been amended so that corporations can not voluntarily take the benefits of the act. Their creditors, however, may of course file a petition against them.

The bill as thus modified provides that bankruptcy proceedings may be had in United States district courts; that suits about the property rights of estates shall be had in the courts which would have had jurisdiction if bankruptcy proceedings had not been instituted; that evidence may be taken as under present laws; that meetings of creditors shall be had at the county seat of the county where the bankrupt resided unless it would be manifestly inconvenient for them, and in that event the court shall designate the place; that claimant; that referees may be appointed and their territorial districts fixe other provisions necessary to make it a clear and comprehensive actupon the subject.

The Torrey bill, as introduced by Col. Oates of Alabama, a bill introduced by Mr. Hopkins of Illinois, and a bill introduced by Mr. Hopkins of Illinois, and a bill introduced by Mr. Hopkins of Illinois, and a bill introduced by Mr. Bailey of Texas were before the committee at the time it considered the subject.

The bill of Mr. Bailey was disposed of by the committee in its report as follows: "This bill by its terms proposes that a part of the proceeding shall take place in the State courts and part in the Federal courts. We do not think that this result can be accomplished without danger of bringing about unfortunate complications between such courts. At best we believe that the administration of the law in two separate tribunals would prove unduly expensive, leave undiminished the opportunities for the commission of fraud, and not be satisfactory to the parties affected by it.

"There seems to be reason to fear that under its provisions all debtors, the dishonest as well as the honest, would be discharged from their debts.

"The fact that it provides only for voluntary bankruptcy leaves to the dishonest debtor, we think, an opportunity to deliberately prepare for bankruptcy to the detriment of his creditors without giving them any right or opportunity to interfere and protect their interests. This possibility would impair the credit of all honest debtors and be of untold injury to them. As the latter, and not the former, are those who are entitled to the consideration of the law, we think its provisions are not sufficiently comprehensive of the subject."

The bill of Mr. Hopkins was disposed of by a mere reference to it, and the on of the law, we think its provisions are not sumciently comprehensive of ne subject. "r.

The bill of Mr. Hopkins was disposed of by a mere reference to it, and the orrey bill was, as stated, reported as a substitute.

The report calls attention to the provision of the Federal Constitution, nder which the exclusive power to pass a bankruptcy law is reserved to ongress, and therefore can not be exercised in a comprehensive way by the tates.

Congress, and therefore can not be exercised in a comprehensive way by the States.

Preceding legislation by Congress upon this subject is referred to and the conclusion reached that because former attempts were not successful is no reason why Congress may not now act wisely upon the subject.

The fact that the States have enacted legislation upon the subject of insolvency is pointed to as constituting conclusive evidence that legislation is necessary making provision for the orderly distribution of those estates which are liquidated because of dishonesty or insolvency of their owners. The inevitable failure of many who engage in transactions on credit is called to mind, and the opinion expressed that it is absolutely necessary to provide legal means for the rehabilitation of honest insolvent debors and the prompt and economical administration of their estates among those to whom they equitably belong.

It is stated that the law in question will apply to the affairs of less than 2 per cent per annum of those conducting transactions on credit, since by statistics it is shown that only that number have their estates administered.

Under the heading "Rights of debtors and creditors" under the present State insolvency law, and under the proposed bankruptcy law, seventeen instances are given in which it is claimed that the interests of both parties will be promoted by the enactment of the law recommended

It is contended in a very carefully written argument that the passage of the bill reported will reduce the price of goods and the interest on money. The necessity for the bill, comprehending as it does both voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, is argued at length, the contention being that a voluntary bankruptcy, is argued at length, the contention being that a voluntary bankruptcy, is argued at length, the contention being that a voluntary bankruptcy, is argued at length, the contention being that a voluntary bankruptcy, is argued at length, the contention being that a voluntary bankruptcy, is argued at length, t class of debtors being the banks; that the effect of a voluntary law would seemingly, therefore, be to favor these gigantic corporations and not the poor people; that fair laws beget confidence, give stability to transactions on credit and redound to the general good, while imperfect laws result in the prevalence of rascality and the high price of goods consumed and large interest on money borrowed; that the people do not demand a partial one-sided law, but one which is in every sense comprehensive of the rights of both debtors and creditors.

It is contended that honest debtors and honest creditors in every station of life are in favor of the bill, and that the opposition is confined to those who have selftsh financial interests in opposing it, to dishonest debtors and avaricious creditors who favor the State laws because under them no debtor can obtain the right to a complete discharge.

The report concludes with the statement that the people are entitled to enjoy all the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution; that one of those rights is to have enacted a bankruptcy law; that it can not be enjoyed except pursuant to enactment by Congress; that bodies of all sorts, and are now demanding the passage of this bill with an impressive unanimity; that the right exists, the demand has been made, and Congress ought to act.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OUTHWAITE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WORLD'S FAIR PRIZE WINNERS' EXPOSITION AT NEW YORK.

Mr. COCKRAN, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4015) in aid of the World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition, to be held at New York City; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

EXTENSION OF TIME TO MINING CLAIMANTS.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims, and move the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:

The report of the committee of conference was read, as follows:
The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 545) to amend section numbered 2524 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining leaims, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:
Strike out all after the word "aball," at the end of the first line, and insert in lieu thereof the words "not apply to the State of South Dakota."
And the Senate agree to the same.

THOMAS A. E. WEADOCK, J. V. COCKRELL. Conferees on the part of the House. WM. M. STEWART, R. F. PETTIGREW, WM. B. BATE, Conferees on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

The Senate amended the bill by providing that it should apply only to natural persons who are bona fide residents of the State or Territory, or adjoining States or Territories, in which the mining claim is located. The Senate conferees receded from this amendment, and all the conferees then agreed to an amendment that the act should not apply to the State of

South Dakota

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report

Mr. REED. What is the meaning of this?

Mr. REED. What is the meaning of this?

Mr. WEADOCK. I will state to the gentleman that the original bill provided that the statute requiring a certain amount of work annually by the claimants should be suspended as to 1893. That bill passed the House. The Senate amended the bill so that it should be limited to natural persons residing in the States and Territories, or adjoining States or Territories, in which the mines were located. That was the amendment which the House conferees disagreed to. Then an amendment was offered, which the conferees all agreed to that the laws. which the House conferees disagreed to. Then an amendment was offered, which the conferees all agreed to, that the law should be passed in the form in which it passed the House, but that it should not apply to South Dakota, following precedents in legislation which have excluded certain States from the operations of general law.

Mr. RAY. Now, if the gentleman will permit me. Mr. Speaker, I can not see any justice whatever in passing a bill of this kind excepting from the provisions of this bill the State of South Dakota. If it is a just and wise provision for one State in the

Mr. WEADOCK. I will state in reply to the gentlemen from

Mr. RAY. I want to state right here that I shall impede this all I can, and shall call for a division. I do not think the gentleman can get it through to-night.

Mr. WEADOCK. I would say, in answer to the statement of the gentleman from New York, that the Senator from South Dakota and both the Representatives from that State presented petitions of some 700 miners of that State objecting to the law applying to that State; and, so far as I am informed, no applica-tion was made for the passage of the bill from South Dakots, and it was the judgment of the conferees that it would be entirely satisfactory to the people of that State, and so the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. After what has been said by the gentleman from New York it is evident that there is nothing for the House to do but to adjourn

Mr. WEADOCK. I have no objection to withdrawing the re-

Mr. PENCE. Ido not think the gentleman from New York will insist on the course he has suggested if he fairly understands the case, and if I may be permitted to say a word as to the effect of the law I can explain it in a few minutes. The only people interested in this enactment are the people who are claimants for unpatented mining claims. Understand the statute provides

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that the pre

Mr. WEADOUK. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect that the presentation of the conference report would provoke discussion at this time of the evening, and I will withdraw the report.

Mr. PENCE. I hope the gentleman will not do that, if there is any chance of prevailing upon the gentleman from New York to withdraw his opposition to the consideration of the conference report upon a full understanding of the matter.

Mr. RAY. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, just one word in reply. I have several people in my district who are situated just as the other people are and who desire to be relieved of the effect of the law as it stands. They have claims in South Dakota, and everybody in the United States will be relieved except these men having claims there if this bill should pass as amended by the conferees. Now, I can see no justice in it; and if the House shall insist on a quorum on the adoption of this report and the passage of this bill they have the power to do it, but I shall oppose it so far as I am able.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws the report; and he can present it at any time, as it is a question of the highest privilege.

Mr. BAILEY. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, November 1, 1893.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ASSISTANT CUSTODIANS AND JANITORS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of October 17, 1893, a list of persons employed in public buildings as assistant custodians, etc.: which, with the accompanying papers, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOAR. I present a memorial of Rev. Gilbert Reid, a gentleman long a missionary in China, representing, I believe, the opinion and desire of the highly respectable persons who have prosecuted the work of the American Board of Missions in that Empire. I desire that the memorial, which is very brief, and states the view I have heretofore suggested, and which is accompanied by the draft of such a bill as would carry out the view, be printed as a document. I ask unanimous consent for that purpose. The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The memorial will lie on the table and be printed as a document.

Mr. PLATT. I present resolutions in the nature of a petition from the Central Labor Union, of Hartford, Conn., praying that the new Printing Office to be built by the Government shall be constructed by day's labor. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOM presented the petition of A. Y. Trogdon, of Champaign, Ill., praying for the publication of all pension decisions made by the Board of Pension Appeals, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 420) granting the right of way for the construction of a railroad and other improvements through and on the Hot Springs Reservation, State of Arkansas, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. By direction of a majority of the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 945) to amend an act entitled "An act to forfeit certain lands heretofore granted for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads, and for other purposes," and submit a report thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892, reported it without amendment.

FORT LARAMIE MILITARY RESERVATION BRIDGES.

Mr. CAREY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 591) "to donate to the county of Laramie, Wyo., certain bridges on the abandoned Fort Laramie military reservation, and for other purposes," to report it with an amendment. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I think there can be no objection to it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read as follows:

Beit enacted, etc., That the bridges erected on the Fort Laramie military reservation by the United States in the county of Laramie, Wyo., are hereby donated to the said county of Laramie, on the condition that the said county shall keep the said bridges in repair and open, free of charge, for the use of the traveling public and the military authorities of the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve from sale and entry of the public lands the grounds upon which the said bridges are located and sufficient land for their protection and for approaches thereto.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be of no effect one year after the date of its passage unless the said county of Laramie shall file in writing, within the said period, with the Secretary of the Interior, its acceptance of the terms of this act.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was to add at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided, That if the said county shall at any time fail to conform to the conditions of this act, the said bridges and the lands that may be reserved shall revert to the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read

The bild was ordered to be engineered for a unit reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAREY. I ask that the letters of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office approving the donation provided by the bill be published in the RECORD for the information of the other House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, September 14, 1893.

Size: I transmit herewith report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office on Senate bill No. 591, entitled "A bill to donate to the county of Laramie, Wyo., certain bridges on the abandoned Fort Laramie military reservation, and for other purposes."
I know of no objection to urge against the passage of said bill, and I submit, for your information, the report of the Commissioner without further comment thereon.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH,

Hon. JAMES H. BERRY, Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, D. C., September 4, 1893.

Siz: I have had the honor to receive, by reference from the Department, under date of August 21, 1893, for report in duplicate and return of paper, Senate bill No. 591. "To donate to the county of Laramie, Wyo., certain bridges on the abandoned Fort Laramie military reservation, and for other purposes," transmitted to the Department August 21, 1893, by Hon. James H. Berry, chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, with a request for the views of your Department thereon.

The bill provides—

"That the bridgeq erected on the Fort Laramie military reservation by the United States in the county of Laramie, Wyo., are hereby donated to the said county of Laramie, on the condition that the said county shall keep the said bridges in repair and open, free of charge, for the use of the traveling public and the military authorities of the United States, and the Secretary of the Interior shall reserve from sale and entry of the public lands the grounds upon which the said bridges are located and sufficient land for their waterities and for approaches thereto.

protection and for approaches thereto.

"Sec. 2. That this act shall be of no effect one year after the date of its passage unless the said county of Laranie shall file in writing, within the said period, with the Secretary of the Interior, its acceptance of the terms of this

"SEC. 2. That this act shall be of no effect one year after the date of 18 pasage unless the said county of Laramie shall file in writing, within the said period, with the Secretary of the Interior, its acceptance of the terms of this act."

In reply, I have the honor to report that the Fort Laramie reservation was established by Executive order of June 28, 1889, and relinquished by the War Department May 28, 1890, and transferred to the Interior Department for disposal under the act of July 5, 1884 (23 Stats., 183). When transferred, the improvements thereon consisted of one set of quarters, two wagon bridges, one footbridge, and a flagstaff.

On May 3, 1890, the Secretary of War requested your Department to inform him whether any objections existed to his issuing a revocable Heense granting to the county of Laramie authority to use and maintain the said bridges for the use of the public. This office made a favorable report thereon to the Department May 13, 1890, but is not advised whether or not said Heense was Issued.

The lands within this reservation. 33,415,24 acres, were disposed of under the homestead laws only by the act of July 10, 1890 (23 Stats., 227), which act provides, among other things. "That this act shall not apply to any subdivision of land, which subdivision may include adjoining lands to the amount of 160 acres, on which any buildings or improvements of the United States are situated until the Secretary of the Interior shall so direct."

After the survey of the reservation was completed, the local officers at Cheyenne, Wyo., on October 13, 1891, were instructed to allow entries for said lands in accordance with the said act of July 10, 1890, their attention being called to the fac, that provision was made for the disposal of lands occupied for town-site purposes, and of lands valuable for minerals, under the town site and mineral laws, respectively, and excepting any of the lands occupied for lower-interest of the special prof the local officers according to instructions, but they erroneou rom entry by the local omeers according to instructions, but they erroneously allowed entries for subdivisions upon which two of the bridges are situated.

The description of the bridges, their locations, and estimated values are as follows: A wooden bridge across the Laramie River, on SE. 1 NW. 1 and NE. 1 SW. 1, sec. 29. T. 25 N., R. 64 W., worth $600: a footbridge across the same river, on NW. 1 NW. 1, sec. 28, same township and range, worth $150, and an iron bridge across the North Platte River, on lots 2 and 3, sec. 25, same township and range, worth $20,000.

On November 5, 1891, the local officers allowed the following homestead entries to be made for lands upon which two of these bridges rost, viz:
H. E. No. 2724, Benjamin A. Hart, for N. 1 NW. 1 and SW. 1 NW. 1, sec. 28, T.
25 N., R. 64 W.
H. E. No. 2730, Annie O'Brien, lots 5 and 6, sec. 21, lots 3 and 4, sec. 22, and lot 2, sec. 27, T. 26 N., R. 64 W.
The subdivision upon which the footbridge is situated, NW. 1 NW. 1, sec.
28, is included in Hart's entry, and one of the subdivisions upon which the fron bridge rests, lot 3, sec. 22, is included in Mrs. O Brien's entry.
When this office became aware that these entries had been allowed to go to record for lands upon which improvements are situated, they were suspended, and the matter was about to be submitted to your Department for consideration, and the local officers were again instructed on July 26, 1893, not to allow entries for lot 2, sec. 22, the other subdivision upon which the tron bridge rests, and the subdivision upon which the wooden bridge is situated, viz, SE. 1 NW. 2 and NE. 2 SW. 2, sec. 29, T. 25 N., R. 64 W.

These homestead entries were improperly allowed for lands reserved by act of Congress, and ino rights to the tracts upon which the improvements are situated have been acquired thereunder, which would interfere with the passage of this bill. I, therefore, see no objections to its becoming a law.
On line 8, page 1, of the bill a typographical error occurs, "Unied" being

HISTORY OF INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATIONS.

Mr. GRAY. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a joint resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 37) to provide for the printing of a history and digest of the international arbitrations to which the United States was a party, and for other purposes, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as fol-

Resolved, etc., That there be printed the usual number of copies of a history of the international arbitrations to which the United States was a party, together with a digest of the decisions rendered in such arbitrations, and that, in addition to said usual number, there be printed and bound in sheep 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the Department of Statesaid history and digest to be printed under the editorial supervision of John Bassett Moore, and the editing to be paid for out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, on the direction of the Secretary of State, at a price not to exceed $2,500, which sum is hereby appropriated, and is to be in full payment for said work, except the cost of printing and binding the same.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HILL. I should like to hear some explanation of the joint resolution.

Mr. GRAY. This matter is familiar to a great many Senators as one that came before us some years ago, prior to the time when the Senator from New York was a member of this body. Perhaps I can best state the scope of the joint resolution and give the information the Senator from New York and other Senators may require by reading a letter from Mr. J. B. Moore, dated September 13, 1893, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

WASHINGTON, September 13, 1893.

The Hon. John T. Morgan, United States Senate.

My DEAR SIR: By a joint resolution, approved July 28, 1886. Congress authorized the publication, under the editorial supervision of Francis Wharton, of a Digest of the International Law of the United States, taken from the Opinions of Presidents and Sepretaries of State, and of Attorneys-General, and from the Decisions of Federal Courts, and of Joint International Commissions in which the United States was a Party.

It was provided by the resolution that the editing should be paid for at a price to be fixed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, acting with the Joint Committee on Printing, not to exceed $10,000.

of Representatives, according that are very extended to profit or the Federal courts was completed, the labor of digesting the decisions of the Federal courts was completed, the labor of digesting the decisions of the international commissions had not progressed far enough to promise an early conclusion. This fact was due to the great amount of labor involved in dealing with the very extensive records and masses of unarranged manuscripts of the commissions.

Under these circumstances Dr. Wharton proceeded to print the International Law Digest, in three volumes, as it now stands, without including the decisions of the International Commissions.

I presume all Senators are familiar with the three volumes edited by Dr. Francis Wharton, than which I think no more important publication has been undertaken by the Government.

edited by Dr. Francis Wharton, than which I think no more important publication has been undertaken by the Government.

But, in his preface to that work (page viii), he stated "the digest of the rulings of the international commissions, " " undertaken by the Hon. John B. Moore, will occupy a separate volume. Of the importance of such a digest I can not speak too highly."

On these facts Dr. Wharton was allowed, from the $10,000 available under the resolution, the sum of $7,500, the sum of $2,500 being reserved for the editing of the commissions.

It was not till 1891, two years after Dr. Wharton's death, that Mr. Moore completed his digest of the decisions of the commissions. In the meantime he had enlarged the scope of the work so as to include, not only international commissions, but also all the international arbitrations to which the Government of the United States has been a party. Besides this, he has added to the digest of the decisions a complete history of our arbitrations, thus presenting a comprehensive view of the subject both in its legal and in its historical aspects.

In February, 1891, Mr. Evarts reported to the Senate, from the Library Committee, a joint resolution to authorize the printing of the history and digest of the arbitrations under the editorial supervision of Mr. Moore. This resolution, being referred to the Printing Committee, was favorably reported by that committee to the Senate on March 2, 1891, and passed unanimously. Its adoption was strongly recommended at the time by the Secretary of State, Mr. Blaine, as appears by his letter to Mr. MANDERSON, of February 20, 1891, a copy of which is herewith inclosed.

In December, 1892, the resolution was introduced in the House by Mr. W. C. P. Bleeckinsteds, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Breckinsteds, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Breckinsteds, and was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The amount authorized by that resolution was $10,000. Seven thousand five hundred dollars was paid to Dr. Wharton and $2,500 were reserved, as was supposed, for the completion of the work by Mr. Moore. I need not state the high character of Mr. Moore as a student and lawyer.

Mr. HILL. Is he the author of Moore on Extradition?

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 1144) for the relief of the estate of Maria E. Warfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a bill (S. 1145) for the relief of the estate of Marcus Walker, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1146) referring the joint claim of T. Alonzo Walker, and Augusta C. Todd for proceeds of cotton to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1147) for the relief of the heirs of Hilary B. Cenas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (S. 1148) to provide a build. Mr. HUNTON introduced a bin (S. 1145) to provide a building site for the National Conservatory of Music of America; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CAFFERY introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 38) relative of contain land titles in Lordon.

tive to the confirmation of certain land titles in Louisiana; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. HILL. I submit two resolutions proposing amendments to the Rules, which I ask to have read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolutions were read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule V of the standing rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Whenever upon any roll call any Senator who is present within the Senate Chamber refuses to make response when his name shall be called, it shall be the duty of the Presiding Officer, either upon his own motion or upon the suggestion of any Senator, to request the Senator so remaining silent to respond to his name, and if such Senator fails so to do, the fact of such request and refusal shall be entered in the Journal, and such Senator shall be counted as present for the purpose of constituting a quorum.

Resolved, That subdivision 2 of Rule V of the Standing Rules of the Senate be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"If at any time during the daily sessions of the Senate a question shall be raised by any Senator as to the presence of a quorum, the Presiding Officer shall forthwith direct the Secretary to call the roll and shall announce the result, and these proceedings shall be without debate; but no Senator while speaking shall be interrupted by any other Senator raising the question of the lack of a quorum, and the question as to the presence of a quorum shall not be raised oftener than once in every hour, but this provision shall not apply where the absence of a quorum is disclosed upon any roll call of the yeas and nays."

ALLOWANCES TO STATES FOR MILITARY SUPPLIES.

Mr. HILL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate the allowances made to the State of New York by the Third Auditor under the provisions of the act of July 27, 1861, and any further allowances to which other States may be entitled under said act, as the same has been construed by the order of the Secretary of the Treasury dated February 8, 1893.

BULLION PURCHASES.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was

Resolved. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish the Senate with a statement giving the aggregate amount of silver builion purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, during the month of October, 1893, together with the cost thereof, the amount, date, and price of each purchase, and the name of the vendor. Also the aggregate amount of silver builion offered for sale during the said month, the amount, date, and price of each offer, and the name of the person making such offer, and how paid for.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes. It further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAYERS, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois, managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H.R. 1917) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith

A bill (H. R. 1917) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Sulphur River in the State of Arkansas, or in the State of Texas;

A bill (H. R. 1919) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Caddo Lake at or near Mooringsport, La., and Cross Bayou, near Shreveport, La.; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 83) donating an abandoned cannon to the committee in charge of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1894.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the action of the House of Representatives on the urgent deficiency appropriation bill be laid before the Senate in order that the Senate may agree to the further conference asked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, further insisting on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered six to the bill, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate accede to the request of the House of Representatives for a further conference. The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. Cock-Rell, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. Cullom were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

bill (H. R. 1917) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Sulphur River in the State of Arkansas or in the State of Texas; and port, La., and Cross Bayou, near Shreveport, La.

A bill (H. R. 1919) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Caddo Lake at or near Moorings-

The joint resolution (H. Res. 83) donating an abandoned cannon to the committee in charge of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1894, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

RELIEF OF SETTLERS ON INDIAN LANDS.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President-

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate at this time consider Senate bill 131.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. GRAY. I do not wish to object if the matter is not to consume too much time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think it will not. A similar bill has passed the Senate before. It is recommended by the Department and I think it can give rise to no controversy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 131) making an appropriation to pay the damages resulting to the persons who went upon the Crow Creek and Winnebago Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, between the 17th day of February and the 27th day of April, 1885.

Mr. GRAY. May I rise to a question of order? I thought that I was recognized and that the Senator from South Dakota rose to present morning business. I gave way supposing that it was a matter of morning business.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I was on the floor for some time before the Senator from Delaware addressed the Chair, and I supposed I was recognized on that account.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from South Dakota will not call up that bill until the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], who is the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs,

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well; I will withdraw my request.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM RECENT CYCLONE.

Mr. HOAR. I introduce the following bill, which I ask unanimous consent may be now considered—

Mr. TURPIE. 1 object.
Mr. HOAR. I desire that the bill may be read in full for information.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator from Indiana to listen for information and see what the bill is.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts to hear a statement. I have sat here now a good many years in my term of service. I have never objected to the introduction of any bill. Service. I have never objected to the introduction of any ont, to the calling of any question, I have never interrupted another Senator, or made the slightest obstruction to business. Yesterday I had occasion to ask for the consideration of a certain measure. I regret very much to resort to the lex talionis. I would rather act from what I conceive at least to be a higher motive, but I obje

Mr. HOAR. If my honorable friend will permit me, I am absolutely certain that if I should disclose to him the reasons for the objection of mine to which he refers he would concur in it.

This is not a matter in which I have the slightest personal interest. It is a matter affecting 30,000 persons who are stirving to death at this moment in a part of the country remote from where I live; and it has become my duty to present this memorial and bill because the memorialist happens to be a near neighbor and bill because the memorialist happens to be a near neighbor of mine when she is at home. Every hour lost will result probably in some human being perishing of starvation. I know the kind heart to which I appeal so well, that I feel quite confident the Senator will at least allow the bill and memorial to be read for information.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator can have the bill read anyway.
Mr. TURPIE. I made a similar uppeal yesterday concern Mr. FIATI. The Senator can have the off read anyway.
Mr. TURPIE. I made a similar appeal yesterday concerning a measure affecting a much larger number of persons. It was unavailing. I never have objected to any Senator's bill, to any Senator's motion, to any Senator's appeal for the consideration of any measure. I therefore claim the courtesy when I ask, as I occasionally do, for consideration, that there should be no objec-I object to this measure.

Mr. BUTLER. May I add—
Mr. HOAR. I will do anything short of going down on my knees to the Senator from Indiana to beg his pardon; that is, within the limits of a decent manhood. I hope he will not carry his feeling into this measure.

Mr. TURPIE. Mr. President, I am not asking the Senator to beg my pardon. He had a perfect right to object yesterday. My right is as perfect to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. The right to have the bill read the first time is unquestioned. I object to a second reading; but let it be

Mr. HOAR. I now desire to have read the memorial of Miss Clara Barton, the president of the Red Cross, which I also present. I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read by title the

Mr. TURPIE. I have no other motive except to maintain the parity of courtesy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the memorial?

Mr. TURPIE. I object. Mr. HOAR. If the Secretary will send the memorial to me I will state its contents.

Mr. President, this is a memorial of Miss Clara Barton, the president of the American Red Cross, who is well known to the country as one of its most distinguished citizens, who had a large share in organizing the relief commission during the war known as the Sanitary Commission, and in executing its work; who as the Sanitary Commission, and in executing its work; who since then, whenever there has been a suffering community from yellow fever or postilence or flood, where the local resources were insufficient to cope with the evil, has repaired with her force to the spot with organized charity and humanity and healing, and has afforded a relief which no unorganized and un-skilled private resource would be sufficient to accomplish.

She is a person known not only throughout our land, but through the whole civilized world. She has inaugurated and obtained the assent of all civilized nations to giving certain privileges and opportunities to the Red Cross, which have been and will be large instrumentalities in alleviating the horrors of war itself. Countless millions and uncounted generations will profit by the humanity of which she has been so largely the embodiment. She has visited, this memorial states, in the service of the Red Cross, the sea islands on the coast of South Carolina and Georgia and the neighboring mainland being summoned by and Georgia and the neighboring mainland, being summoned by a distress and destitution occasioned by the terrible cyclone which passed over that country, a cyclone which not only de-stroyed crops, but prostrated dwellings and was accompanied by floods, which destroyed natural and artificial systems of drain-age throughout that region, so that it is a water-soaked and water-logged tract of country, where not only the absence of food menaces starvation to these 30,000 people, but pestilence, miasma, and malaria are to follow. There has been no such tale miasma, and malaria are to follow. There has bee of human suffering in this country for a long time.

It happens to me to present the memorial in which these facts are recited, not because of any personal relation of mine to the subject, but solely because this lady happens to have her dwelling within 10 miles of the spot where I live.

A large sum of money—a considerable sum of money, I will not speak of it as a large sum of money—has been raised by private resources; other sums of money will be raised; and this lady thinks she can take care of these people through the winter de-cently if there can be an appropriation of $50,000, to be employed in setting them at work to restore the ravages occasioned by the

I present this memorial, and ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration of the bill. My honorable friend from Indiana, I think, would ordinarily rather prefer, before he makes an objection merely because he remembers that I once made an objection to something of his, to know something of my reasons, but we will let all that pass.

Mr. BUTLER. I think perhaps I ought to make a statement in connection with the memorial and bill presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

Miss Clara Barton, to whom the Senator from Massachusetts has referred as the president of the Red Cross Association, went to South Carolina at my request and that of the governor of the State soon after the recent terrible disaster along the coast, which has not been exaggerated, and can not be exaggerated.

May I interrupt the honorable Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir. Mr. TURPIE. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from South Carolina whether he desires that the memorial be

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad to have it read; but I want to first make a statement in connection with it.
Mr. TURPIE. If the honorable Senator from South Carolina desires the memorial read I shall withdraw my objection,

Mr. BUTLER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Miss Barton, as I said, went to South Carolina at my request and at the request of the governor of the State. I accompanied her when she made her first visit. We had seen reports in the newspapers of the effects of the storm which swept along that coast, but they did not begin to do justice to the extent of the destruction which resulted. The Senator from Massachusetts has said that that storm swept over those islands, and from the best information we could gather, about a thousand of those people were drowned. After going there in person, the surprise to me was that any of them escaped. That cyclone occurred at a season of the year when the crops were maturing from which the people there expected to get through the winter. The fall is very much more terrible than perhaps any other season of the year. Among other things, according to the reports of persons who have made a critical examination, there were 6,000 houses of those people destroyed by that flood and wind, almost their entire crop was swept away, nearly all of their work animals and their farming implements were also destroyed, and they were left in that condition.

Miss Barton went down, and, as I said, I accompanied her to Beaufort, meeting the governor of the State on the railroad as we were going down. There had been a committee organized in the city of Charleston and one in the city of Beaufort. They had, as the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, collected quite a quantity of supplies, clothing, and some money, not a very large amount.

I requested the Secretary of Agriculture to send them all the turnip and cabbage seed he had to spare, and such seed as could be made available at this season of the year in that climate. He did very kindly send down, I think, 5,000 packages of turnip seed and quite a quantity of cabbage seed, which have been planted and from which the hope is that valuable results will be realized. Miss Barton hesitated for sometime about taking charge of this work. After consultation with the committees, I advised that the whole matter be turned over to the Red Cross, which was done. She finds, upon a more critical inquiry and examina-tion, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, that there are 30,000 people, almost entirely colored people, who are now suf-fering for something to eat. As I said, their habitations have been swept away and many of them are now living on the ground without shelter. Miss Barton told me yesterday or the day before that the allowance she was enabled to give to a family of five or six people was 1 pound of bacon and 1 peck of homing. that they had to live on that for a week.

I felt some delicacy in asking Congress to make this appro-I felt some deleacy in asking congress to make this appropriation, because my views upon that subject are thoroughly well understood, and my opinion now is that the State I in part represent ought to go to the rescue and relief of those people; but if the State does not do it and private contributions do not relieve the distress, there is bound to be very great suffering among those people in the next five or six months. The Senstor from Massachusetts very kindly, after conferring with me, agreed to offer the memorial and bill.

Miss Barton's idea was, first, when she discussed the matter with me, not to ask Congress for an appropriation to buy rations with me, not to ask Congress for an appropriation to buy rations and clothing and things of that kind, but to ask Congress for an appropriation of $50,000, which might be used in putting those people to work, rebuilding their houses, draining their land, and doing whatever work they could get to do.

Unfortunately, the Marine Phosphate Company and other companies which heretofore have given employment to a great many of these people were absolutely stranded by the story and many of these people were absolutely stranded by the storm, not only losing in actual money, as I am informed, about $150,000, but their dredges were turned upside down and sunk, their wharves were washed away, and it has been impossible for them to resume. So that source of employment has been paralyzed and destroyed. When those companies shall be able to resume none of us can say, possibly not this winter. calamity

In addition to that, the resources of all the white people in that country have been in a large measure seriously impaired, so that they scarcely have more than enough for their own pur-

I do not know what course Congress will take in regard to the subject, and I am generally the last person to ask for this kind of appropriation from the Government. I repeat that I have heretofore held, and now hold, it is only where there is some overpowering, uncontrollable condition with which the local au-thorities can not deal that I can conceive that Congress may properly interfere and loan its aid, at least.

I thought it was due to the Senator from Massachusetts and to myself that I should make this statement. He has very kindly and generously offered the memorial and the bill. The Senator from Indiana having consented to the reading of the memorial, I should be glad to have it read, and also the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I have objected to the second reading of the bill, and that objection holds, and will not the second reading of the bill, and that objection holds, and will not worth while to waste time about it.

be withdrawn. It is not worth while to waste time about 10.

Mr. BUTLER. I am not wasting any time. I should be very glad to have the memorial read. If there is objection to its being read by the Secretary, I shall take the memorial and make it a part of my remarks, which would only subject me to inconvenience. I understand, however, that there is no objection to the reading of the memorial as I ask that it may be read.

the reading of the memorial, so I ask that it may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will read the memorial.

The Secretary read as follows:

A memorial.

The Secretary read as follows:

A memorial.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The American National Red Cross, an organization, national and international, official in other countries and semioficial in this, taking charge of relief work unprovided for by law, other than the Marine Hospital and Life Saving Departments of the Government take cognizance of, respectfully and prayerfully presents this memorial to you in behalf and in the name of the $0.000 destitute and suffering people on the sea islands of our coast.

On the petition and at the earnest solicitation not only of South Carolina's governor, her senior Senator, and most prominent citizens, but also some of the leading humanitarians of the country, the Red Cross went to the field of calamity, and after a careful, thorough, painstaking investigation that only veterans in that kind of work can make, we, the president of the Red Cross and her field officers, find this condition of affairs to exist:

In a district 135 miles long, from the islands on the boundary line of South Carolina and Georgia, to those about Charleston on the north and from Hilton Heal, Folly, and Morris Islands, to a point inland 20 miles, or where the tidal wave had spent its fury, there are $0.000 people suffering for the bare necessities of life, starvation their immediate heritage. Hungry, naked, sick, and homeless, these men, women, and children stand utterly helpless, stricken dumb before this awful work of the midnight storm.

Where but a few short weeks ago were happy homes, cotton, potato, and corn fields, representing months of patient toil and industry, almost ready for the harvest, now naught remains but the bleak and desolate land, a board or two in the drift; that is all; no house, no crop; all gone.

Thirty thousand people to feed, clothe, nurse, and shelter for seven months, to until next year? scrops can be harvested; todo this we have on hand scant $30.000, a dollar to keep one person alive for seven months, to s

Just to feed this vast multitude and keep anything for the future needs, we are obliged to make this standard ration: For a family of seven persons for one full week, I peck of hominy or grits, and I pound of pork.

Six thousand houses will have to be built entire or repaired as necessity demands. We have already purchased 500,000 feet of lumber, the generous lumber merchants and railroad officials making it possible to get this large amount at 55 a thousand feet delivered, with the privilege of duplicating the amount if necessary. The people can rate this lumber to their islands; but saws, hatchets, and rails must be had to build the houses.

The soil on these islands is wet and sour, the drains and ditches choked up and useless, and vegetation will thrive in but comparatively few places. The people are living on this damp ground in tents, under sheds, and tree limbs, and the storm of the 12th of October that swept over this district found them defenseless, and left them in a more pitiful condition than ever. Malaria in acute form is there, typhoid, typhus, and pneumonia will, in the near future, be epidemic.

Malaria in acute form is there, typhoid, typhus, and pneumonia will, in the near future, be epidemic.

The condition of the district is as stated; the remedy we suggest is this: The sum of 80,000 be intrusted to the Red Cross upon good and sufficient bonds in double the amount named, to be used wholly and solely in the employment of labor, in putting the islands in proper sanitary conditions, draining the lands so that crops can be produced and houses built for the people who are now helpiess through no fault of theirs. Strict account to be kept, and voucners made for every expenditure, and if a balance remain it shall be returned to the Treasury of the United States.

The Red Cross will undertake to feed and clothe these people from the funds and provisions given by our generous citizens, if it can be relieved in the manner prayed for; free rations must not be given, as that demoralizes and pauperizes.

If the lands are not drained and ditched, no crops can be grown, which will keep the people in an impoverished condition.

and pauperizes.

If the lands are not drained and ditched, no crops can be grown, which will keep the people in an impoverished condition.

We pray your favorable consideration of this memoral, and immediate action by joint resolution, for if relief is delayed the world will soon ring with the humiliating cry that a famine exists in the United States of America.

CLARA BARTON.

President of the American National Red Cross.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senators from South Carolina and Massachusetts that the memorial be printed as a document, and that it be not printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. It is very brief.

Mr. GORMAN. The memorial has been read to the Senate, it is true, for information, and that was proper; but I suggest that the Senator will accomplish all he wishes by having it printed and published as a document.

Mr. HOAR. I think Senators would like to have the memorial appear as part of the proceedings of the Senate. It is very brief, and its printing may save a good deal more in the way of debate than the memorial will occupy in the RECORD. Mr. GORMAN. Very well; if the Senator insists upon it, I press the request.

Mr. HOAR. I give notice that to-morrow morning, after the routine morning business, I shall move to take up the bill.

Mr. PEFFER. Before any action is taken I ask the consent of the Senate to be heard a minute or two. I know the remarks which have been made have been out of order, and because of that I ask that I may be heard very briefly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kansas Mr. PEFFER. This matter, Mr. President, is a very serious as from every point of view. Not only is it serious, but it is one from every point of view. Not only is it serious, but it is one that in a much enlarged form will very soon be brought to the attention of Congress from other portions of the country, as well as the particular locality mentioned in the memorial. There are a great many other people who are in circumstances as destitute as these. The miners in the mining regions, many of the farmers in different portions of the country, and especially in the newer portions, are in the same condition. I have in my hand now a printed dispatch in the New York Press, referring to some of the people in the southwestern counties of my own State, where a similar condition prevails. The same is true in many other portions of the country, in the manufacturing regions in the Eastern States, in New York City, in Boston, and all over the country, from which appeals are coming to us of the same

What I wish to say in connection with this subject is, that if it is pressed upon the attention of the Senate, while I believe that we have no constitutional authority whatever for using the that we have no constitutional authority whatever for using the people's money for such a purpose, yet, if this is pressed, I shall ask that the area be enlarged to take in the whole country, and that an appropriation sufficiently large be made to set all the idle men in the United States at work. That is all I wish to say.

PERMITS FOR OPENING STREETS AND ALLEYS.

Mr. DOLPH. I offer a resolution, which I ask may be considered at this time

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, directed to communicate to the Senate the following information, to wit:

1. How many permits have been granted by them for the opening of streets and alleys, or portions of the same, for the laying or the repairing of water pipes, sewers, or for other purposes, since the lat day of December, 1862;

2. How much money was required by them to be deposited upon the granting of each permit?

3. How much of the amount deposited with each permit granted was required to restore the paving over each cut made under each permit granted?

4. What portion of the amount, if any, of the deposit made with each permit granted was in excess of the amount actually required to restore the mit granted was in excess of the amount actually required to restore the cut made under such permits?

5. What was the deficit, if any, in the deposit made for each or any of the permits granted for the purposes heretofore mentioned?

6. What disposition was made of the amounts deposited in excess, if any, of the cost of the work under each permit granted?

7. If there was a deficit in any of the deposits made for permits referred to above, how was said deficit provided for?

8. What price is paid for the repairing of the cuts made for the purposes above mentioned, and how is the amount of work done under each permit ascertained; is the measurement made by the contractor or an officer of the District of Columbia?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANDERSON. It seems to me that that resolution calls

Mr. MANDERSON. It seems to me that that resolution calls for an enormous amount of detailed information, the publication of which would be exceedingly expensive. It may be that the resolution is so guarded as not to run into too much detail; but I ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DOLPH. I suggest to the Senator that I do not think that is the case. I understand the practice in the District is, and parhang the law is that when proceedings.

that is the case. I understand the practice in the District is, and perhaps the law is, that when a party desires to cut up the streets for the purpose of laying water pipes he must make a deposit. I understand that there has been no report made of the amount deposited or the amount required for the repair of streets; that there has never been any deposit returned or any account made, if there should be a deposit. This comes to me from a very responsible party in the District, who wants information on the subject; and the resolution only covers a year. It is information which is not published and is not given to the published and is not given to the published and is not given to the published and the resolution of the subject is not published and the publishe public in any shape. It need not be printed, but when the information is sent in it may go to the Committee on Printing if it becomes necessary. Certainly, however, it is information which should be given to the public in some way. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.
Mr. MANDERSON. All right.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not object.
The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ENGROSSMENT AND ENROLLMENT OF BILLS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution proposing a change in the method of enrolling and engrossing bills. I think it will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following House concurrent resolution:

following House concurrent resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, beginning with the first day of the regular session of the Fifty-third Congress, to wit, the first day of the regular session of the Fifty-third Congress, to wit, the first Monday in December, 1893, in fleu of being engrossed, every bill and joint resolution in each House of Congress at the stage of the consideration at which a bill or joint resolution is at present engrossed, shall be printed, and such printed copy shall take the place of what is now known as, and shall be called, the engrossed bill, or resolution, as the case may be; and it shall be dealt with in the same manner as engrossed bills and joint resolutions are easit with at present, and shall be sent in printed form, after passing, to the other House, and in that form shall be dealt with by that House, and its officers in the same manner in which engrossed bills and joint resolution are now dealt with.

Resolved, That when such bill or joint resolution shall have passed both Houses, it shall be printed on parchment, which printshall be in lieu of what is now known as, and shall be dealt with in the same manner in which enrolled bills and joint resolutions are now dealt with.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby charged with the duty of having the foregoing resolutions properly executed, and is empowered to take such steps as may be necessary to carry them into effect, and provide for the speedy execution of the printing herein contemplated.

Mr. MANDERSON. This concurrent resolution received the

This concurrent resolution received the approval of the joint committee of the two Houses charged with the duty of investigating matters of this character, and it was referred on my motion to the Committee on Printing of the Sen-That committee reported it back without recommendation. believing that there was hardly time for that exploration which might be needed to make a report which would be of value.

I think that this is a step in the right direction. The only thing I fear is that in the closing days of a session, particularly when appropriation bills are pressing for consideration and receive that constant change which comes from conference between the two Houses, we may be embarrassed and may find our selves in a strait-jacket which would prevent that freedom of action which is desired.

The resolution is in the form, it is true, of a concurrent resolution, as it should be, and can at any time very easily be changed, and therefore I make no objection to it; but I think we shall find when we come to the closing hours of a session, and particularly the short session, that the delay incident to sending the great appropriation bills to the Printer and their return will be greatly to our embarrassment.

I do not, however, object to the resolution. I have talked with some of the experts and with the foreman of the Printing Office. and he thinks the thing can be cared for, unless probably at the exceptional time I have mentioned.
Mr. DOLPH. I was about to inc

Mr. DOLPH. I was about to inquire of the committee if they had considered this very matter, that is, how this resolution would affect the transaction of business during the last hours of a session which is terminated by limitation of law?

Mr. MANDERSON. I will say, and I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Cockrell] will say, that this is in the nature of an experiment as much as anything else, to see if we can not get into a better way of doing business.

Mr. DOLPH. Of course if Congress will govern itself accordingly and virtually get through with legislation on the 3d of March, instead of extending it into the next day, it can be done. I rose to suggest whether it would not be well to amend the resolution so as to except the last days of sessions which are limited by law.

Mr. COCKRELL. In answer to the Senator I desire to say that, as a matter of course, we can not see exactly what may be the complications in the press of business which may come in the last few hours of a Congress at the short session only. is no danger at any other time. This is only a concurrent resolution, and we can amend it in ten minutes at any time we wish to, so that we may carry it out perfectly.

Nearly every other nation has its engrossing and enrolling prieted. I requested the Secretary of State to communicate with our ministers in England and Germany and France, and a number of other countries, and to secure a statement of their methods of engrossment and enrollment. We had all this information of the countries of th mation presented in form. England adopted her present method of printing in 1849, and they have had no trouble at all in printing instead of enrolling and engrossing bills in Parliament.

We desire to have this concurrent resolution now passed in order that we may commence at the beginning of the next ses sion, and so that we can make improvements and perfect the machinery during the long session, when I have no doubt we can carry it on with success. I think in all probability in the closing days of the short session only it may be necessary to have quite a number of printers here, with material and appliances in the building; but otherwise there will be no necessity

We never have an appropriation bill which can not be returned to us from the Printing Office inside of four hours, and in an emergency it could be done in less time than that.

Mr. DOLPH. In an emergency the operation

Mr. DOLPH. In an emergency the operation of the resolu-tion could in a few minutes be suspended for the balance of the session?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes. The resolution is a concurrent one, and we can suspend or amend it at any time. I am anxious that we shall commence to operate under it at the beginning of the session, so that, under the direction of the Committee on Printing, any improvements or changes which may be found necess may be made, and we can have them perfected by the close of the first short session. Mr. GORMAN. Mr. F Mr. President, there can be no question about the desirability of this proposed change, if it is practicable. A number of mistakes were made at the last session of Congress in some of the great appropriation bills, probably more numerous than at any other session, involving very large sums of money; for instance, a bill was engrossed, and on account of the committee not being able to examine it in print quite a number of errors occurred, items being left out and items added. This did not occur in this body, but in another, owing to the hurry and confusion at the latter end of the session.

I am in thorough sympathy with the object the Senator from Missouri has in view, and he has given this matter more atten-tion than any other member of the body as chairman of the joint commission; but I ask him whether it would not be wise to insert a provision by which a bill may be engrossed in the usual manner, if an emergency arises, so as to leave it in the discretion of the committee in the last days of a session to have a bill printed

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, an emergency can not arise without our knowing of it. The very moment the Committee on Printing intimates that they wish an amendment adopted to this resolution, we can pass an amendatory concurrent resolution There would be no trouble about that. unanimous consent. by unanimous consent. There would be no trouble about that. In the meantime let the resolution operate and let the House of Representatives know that they must get their bills through a little sooner than they have been in the habit of doing. I think one result will be that the House will get their bills through a little sooner, and then we shall not be so much pressed at the close of the session.

There is force in what the Senator says, but if the emergency to which he refers arises, we can pass an amendatory resolution

Mr. GORMAN. Being in hearty sympathy with the resolution, I shall make no objection to it. I wish to express $m_{\overline{\nu}}$ thanks to the Senator for the trouble he has taken in regard to this question

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the resolution of the House of Representatives.

The resolution was concurred in.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

Mr. GRAY. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3687.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Delaware to proceed to the consideration of the bill named by him.

ration of the bill named by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, it is not necessary that I should detain the Senate by any extended discussion of the bill in explaining an exigency which is believed by many is upon us in regard to the situation produced by the unintended operation of the act of May 5, 1892, entitled, "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States." ing of Chinese persons into the United States."

That act as is known undertook to remedy what was considered by those communities, in which this population has become an important element, an evil which was obtaining under the then existing laws. The act required that all Chinese laborers within the United States should, within one year from the date of the passage of the act of May 5, 1892, take out before a designated officer a certificate of residence, with certain other provisions to which it is not necessary now to refer.

After the passage of the act there were certain prominent members of that race who considered this law a great hardship upon their people resident in this country. Accordingly they consulted very eminent counsel in the United States, the mention of whose names will at once show that they are men whose opinions are entitled to great consideration, Messrs. Carter, Ashton, and Choate of the city of New York, and obtained from these gentlemen an opinion that that act was unconstitutional, and that there was no obligation of law upon any Chinese person to conform to its provisions. Thereupon the great body of persons of that race in this country, amounting to over one hundred and fifteen or one hundred and twenty thousand, declined to conform to these requirements, and refused to take out the registration which was prescribed.

That the refusal was made in good faith I have no doubt; but it has created a great hardship upon those people, because, after this created a great nardship upon those people, because, after this opinion had been rendered by these eminent counsel as to the constitutionality of this law, the case was brought by due process of law to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States, by a divided court—I think five to three—declared the act to be constitutional. That decision was made, however, ten days after the expiration of the time within which the act of May 5, 1892, prescribed that certificates of registration should be taken out, and these people were left in the deployable situation of being confronted with were left in the deplorable situation of being confronted with the law being declared constitutional, contrary to their expectations, without their having conformed to its provisions and without having at that time any opportunity to conform to them. So that over 100,000 of these unfortunate people are amenable to the penalties of that law and are liable to deportation. We find that the House of Representatives has sent us a bill, which has grown out of the pressure created by this exigency, a bill which in common justice extends the time within which these unfortunate persons may take out certificates of registration, which they omitted to take out under the circumstances I have narrated.

I think that that portion of the act is clear, and I can not see that it requires any further commendation.

In passing the bill through the other House it appears, as was inevitable, that people on the Pacific coast and others who have very decided opinions upon the whole matter of Chinese residence and Chinese immigration, made their opinions felt in the bill which has some to us and as a result of that feeling there bill which has come to us, and as a result of that feeling there are certain provisions which have been added to the first section which extends the time for registration. The bill, I suppose, may be described as a compromise between extremes of opinion. and it seems to have been the very best bill which under the circumstances could immediately be passed through the other

The provisions following the first section do not entirely meet my approval. I should have preferred simply to extend the time. Yet I do not consider them important enough, nor do I believe they would operate in so material a degree of harshness as to provent any one who appreciates the present situation from voting for the bill as an entirety.

I have been informed at the Department of Justice that there are now about one hundred of these persons in the jail of San Francisco. They can not be bailed, and they are lying there under a sentence of deportation. If the bill fails to pass we shall neglect sentence of deportation. If the bill fails to pass we shall neglect to relieve this very oppressive and harsh situation, and immediately there will be a very large number of Chinese persons under arrest, without bail, and with no provision yet made by law to defray the expenses of carrying into effect the sentence passed by the court under the act of May 5, 1892.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator does not mean to say that the money appropriated to avecute the act can not be availed to the money appropriated to execute the act can not be applied to that purpose as well as to carry out any other provision of the law? Mr. GRAY. I am informed that there is at present not sufficient money to execute the act. I am told by the Department and by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that would require an appropriation of between $6,000,000 and 87,000,000, to be taken out of our depleted Treasury, to carry out the provisions of an act passed under the circumstances of which I have spoken, which need not be spent at all if we would merely extend the time for registration. That large sum of money can be saved, and at the same time the humanity of the people of the United States will not have put upon it any stress such as is now being placed upon all right-thinking people by the situation of these people on the Pacific coast. Mr. HAWLEY. I should be glad to ask a question of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly. Mr. HAWLEY. Will this bill relieve the poor fellows who are in jail?

Mr. GRAY. It will, I am informed by the Attorney-General Mr. HAWLEY. By what authority are they kept in jail? Does the act provide that they shall be imprisoned?

By the act of 1892 they are held under a sentence of deportation. Mr. HAWLEY.

Yes, but the act does not say that they shall be confined in jail.

Mr. GRAY. There may be something in what the Senator from Connecticut says. I am not at present prepared to state what the authority claimed by the courts is to keep them in jail. It is sufficient for me to know that they are now in jail by the sentence and with the consent of the circuit courts of the United States, courts to whom has been given jurisdiction over this matter, and they are so held in obedience to the will of the judges of those courts.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator perhaps can tell me whether I am correctly informed. I understand that one of our circuit judges, Judge Lacombe, has given what would seem a proper judgment- that a Chinese person can not be so held, under the act, while awaiting deportation.

Mr. GRAY. I understand that Judge Lacombe did hold that, and perhaps it was creditable to his humanity; but other judges have declined to find any authority for following his example. Whatever may be the law in the matter, like the man who is in the stocks, they are there. It shocks my sense of humanity and appeals to me as strongly as any case which concerns individual liberty that has ever been brought before this body since I have been a member of it that these people should lie there without any fault of their own, as I conceive, and we should not relieve

Mr. HAWLEY. There is another question. I hardly know how to ask the question that is in my mind. The bill bears a certain resemblance to a treaty, because it is well understood, through the public prints, that there have been frequent communications between the Chinese Government and our Government upon these matters. I wish I knew, officially or unofficially whether our State Department, as well as the Chinese minister. whether our State Department, as well as the Chinese minister.

are tolerably well satisfied with this arrangement?

Mr. GRAY. I wish I could answer the Senator, because the query that is in his mind has suggested itself to my own; but I am not able to answer him. I have an impression, though not gained from any official source, that there is no particular obgained from any ometat source, that there is no particular op-jection on the part of the Chinese embassy here; but of that I cannot speak with any certainty. However, I do feel that if this were an original proposition to establish a system of registra-tion, the other provisions in the bill would meet my disapproval and I should vote against them.

But that is not the situation with which we are confronted. The act of May 5, 1892, established these conditions and made the law such as I have described it. Under it there exists an exceedingly unfortunate situation which the bill certainly will measurably relieve. With that understanding, and with that protest against this kind of legislation (although I am not opposed to proper legislation to restrict the coming of Chinese persons into the country), I am willing and anxious to vote for the pending bill in order to cure the evil which has grown up under previous acts.

Mr. HOAR rose. Mr. HAWLEY. Just one word, and I will be out of the way Mr. HAWLEY. Just one word, and I will be out of the way of the Senator from Massachusetts. I read with a good deal of mortification the history of our relations with the Government and people of China. It is not becoming perhaps to say so, but in fact I am ashamed of my country in that matter. I may vote for the pending bill, but it is not with great satisfaction.

Mr. GRAY. As I have said, I share some of the feeling which the Senator from Connecticut expresses. I have considered this matter as carefully as I could; I have consulted the persons who I thought ware familiar with the exicancy and I have gained

I thought were familiar with the exigency; and I have gained my own consent to vote for it as an exigent measure to relieve the country from the shame and mortification of having these people in large numbers subjected to suffering and indignity from which we ought to relieve them.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware before he sits down two questions, if he will be kind enough to give me his attention.

First, what change does he understand is made in the signification of the words "laborers" and "merchants" as they have been used in former laws by the second section of the proposed That is the first question I desire to have the Senator an-

Mr. GRAY. I understand— Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I had better state my questions and then

t down, that the Senator may answer both. The second question is whether, under lines 26 to 31, near the close of the fourth page, the Senator understands that the privi-lege of habeas corpus is denied to persons imprisoned by the United States marshal under a real or alleged order of deporta-tion, and, if it be not denied, whether the provision that the person shall not be admitted to bail, but shall remain in custody, changes the existing practice on habe is corpus, which permits the court in its discretion to admit the applicant to be bailed pending the habeus corpus proceedings, which in this case might possibly be delayed for a long time; that is, there might be a petition to the circuit court of the United States, and an appeal or other process which would remove the question to the Supreme Court of the United States?

Now, my question is whether the Senator does not think that here is a denial to persons alleged to be Chinese persons, because of an order of deportation, of the right to have the question of habeas corpus dealt with, they being at large and their return secured by bail if the court, in its discretion, so orders?

Those are the two questions.

Mr. GRAY. I will say to the Senator as to the provision subsequent to the first section, I would have been glad had the first section constituted the whole act. Those provisions are somewhat irritating, perhaps some may consider them a little harsh; but they are not sufficiently so to prevent me from voting to relieve the greater evil which exists in the present situation.

would have preferred that it should be left to the courts, where I think it properly belongs, to give an interpretation and construction of the terms "merchant" and "laborer" rather than to undertake in this proposed act, which is not unusual in these latter days, to give an interpretation and construction to those words. I think the law as it existed before the act of 1892 left that construction to the court, where it would have been better to have left it.

As to the other question, I am not prepared to say that the provision to which the Senator from Massachusetts has called my attention denies to any of the persons who may be arrested for not having a certificate of registration the right to the writ of habeas corpus. I believe that this proposed law leaves it where it is, and it ought and must be—

Mr. HOAR. What is the significance of the phrase that they "shall not be admitted to bail?"

Mr. GRAY. The provision that they shall not be admitted Air. GitAl. The provision that they shall not be aimitted to bail is another and a distinct provision. A man may think he is entitled to the writ of habeus corpus, and he may be discharged entirely if he should prove that he is not a Chinese person or that he has a certificate of registration and therefore a not a manable to this provision of law. I do not consider the s not amenable to this provision of law. I do not consider this to be a criminal proceeding. It is a matter wherein the sovereignty of the United States undertakes to protect itself against the coming into the country and residence here of certain undesirable classes, and in doing that I suppose we have a right to say that when an examination is made by the courts and it is determined that they shall be deported they shall not be ad-

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I think he does not quite get the point of my interrogatory. The first part of the interrogatory, I suppose, would elicit the answer the Senator has given; that is, he does not deny the writ of habeas cor-I do not at this moment think of any other case where bail would be lawful or admissible, except on an application for habeas corpus in the discretion of the court. It may be issued by the Supreme Court returnable to a circuit court. Does not the Senator think the provision that a man shall not be admitted to bail when he is in custody under an order of deportation is a provision that he shall not be admitted to bail on habeas corpus; and therefore, if a person is alleged to be subject to deportation when he is not, or if a person be arrested, and when the marshal is about to execute the order of deportation he carries his appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, must he not remain in custody without bail if this provision be carried into effect and be constitutional?

I think so.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. HOAR.

Mr. GRAY. I think so.
Mr. HOAR. Now, is not that a great objection to it?
Mr. GRAY. I think not. I am not prepared now to discuss the constitutionality of the question. I hope that that and every other constitutional objection will be discussed and finally decided by the Supreme Court. But it strikes me that if, as the Supreme Court has decided, we have the right to pass such a bill as this, which I do not deny, by virtue of the inherent sovereignty of the United States to protect itself from undesirable immigration or the residence of undesirable aliens, then I believe the measures here enacted in the exercise of that power to make it efficient or adaptable to the end in view are not unnecessarily harsh or cruel.

I can not conceive how a general deportation of a large class of people could ever be efficiently carried out if upon the inception of the act of deportation, in addition to allowing an inquiry, which they are entitled to, and by habeas corpus as to the legality of their arrest to determine whether they are subject to the provisions of the law or not, the court should also be allowed to give bail, because if that were the case the whole object of the act, it seems to me, might be very easily defeated.

But that is a matter, Mr. President, upon which I can not and would not like to commit myself in this sudden way. If it be unconstitutional there is a way of testing it, and I hope it will be tested. It is certainly worthy of consideration and suggestion so distinguished a Senator as the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PALMER. May I ask the Senator from Delaware whether his statement that there is a way of testing it is not an abdica-tion on the part of the Senate of its own duty, which the Constitution reserves to Congress? Mr. GRAY. I think not, for

I think not, for I have more than once on the floor of the Senate stated my very clear and emphatic opinion of the duty of the Senate itself to decide a matter of constitutional duty. I can only say that I do not see now a constitu-tional objection to the provision that will prevent me from vot-ing for the bill. I will not say that I am so clear upon the point as to be dogmatic about it, but I am sufficiently clear to allow me to vote for the bill.

Mr. HOAR rose.

Mr. PALMER. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Massachusette in any remarks he would like to make.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to discuss the bill at length at this time, but I confess I do not exactly agree, if I understand him, with the Senator from Delaware, an eminent jurist, a member of the committee to whom has been intrusted the duty of reporting and advocating the pending bill. On asking him whether the bill, leaving the habeas corpus, as he thinks it does, to any person who undertakes to resist deportation from the country under its provisions, denies the right of bail during the pendency of the habeas corpus, although it may be pending months or a year, he says, I understand, that he would not like

Mr. GRAY. I did not say one way or the other.

Mr. GRAY. I did not say that.

Mr. GRAY. I did not say one way or the other. I said just now, in answer to the Senator from Illinois, that I am sufficiently satisfied as to the constitutionality of the provision to yet for satisfied as to the constitutionality of the provision to vote for the bill this minute; but when the doubt was suggested from so respectable a source as the Senator from Massachssetts, I said I would not be dogmatic enough to say that it was clear from all doubt; and I shall be very glad to see it tested in the Supreme

Mr. HOAR. I should like to put a question to the Senator from Delaware, who is an able constitutional lawyer. Does the Senator from Delaware conceive that it is a compliance with the Constitution of the United States in regard to persons to whom its protection extends to deny bail pending habeas corpus proceedings?

Mr. GRAY. I am not prepared to say that the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of the legislative power which the Supreme Court has decided that it possesses, may not do that thing. I do not see why it should not. There is nothing I know of expressly in the Constitution of the United States in regard to the matter of bail except the restriction that excessive bail shall not be demanded. It does not occur to me now that there is any other provision on the subject.

But, Mr. President, I was about to resign the floor. I merely wished to introduce this matter and explain, as I understand it the exigency that is upon us to deal with the situation now confronting us on the Pacific coast.

I expect and hope to hear from both the Senators from Call-I expect and nope to hear from both the Senators from California. The senior Senator from California (Mr. White) is now here, and he was one of the able counsel who argued this case before the Supreme Court of the United States. He can speak to us very instructively upon the constitutional points which have been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, for he undoubtedly has studied, as was his duty as a lawyer, the whole with that was submitted to the count matter that was submitted to the court.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President—

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Illinois will pardon me, I do not desire to proceed now to address the Senate, but I should like to move an amendment. If the Senator is about to proceed I think he would perhaps like to address himself to the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. PALMER. Certainly.
Mr. HOAR. I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the entire bill, and I then propose, which I suppose to be in order, to move to perfect the original bill before the substitute is voted upon by striking out all of the provisions of the original bill after the first section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BUTLER in the chair).

Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to have his amendment read?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; I suppose it should be read.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

Mr. DAVIS, I send to the desk a proposed amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Minnesota. The SECRETARY. Amend by striking out all after the enacting clause of the bill and inserting:

That those certain acts of Congress entitled severally, "An act to prohibit thecoming of Chinese laborers to the United States," approved September 13. 1888; an actentitled "An act as supplement to an act entitled An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese, approved the 6th day of May. 1882; "a approved October 1, 1888; and an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers into the United States," approved May 5, 1892, be, and the same are severally hereby, repealed.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President, I sympathize very much in the feeling of the inhabitants of the Pacific coast in regard to the feeling of the inhabitants of the Facine coast in regard to the exclusion of Chinese, but at the same time there are certain considerations apart from that feeling. By the way, I may say that I remember that this bill is a modification of an act passed in the last Congress, and, to some extent, it is an improvement on that law. I opposed the act of 1892 for reasons that are but slightly obviated by the pending bill, but it is better than the act of 1892 than the act of 1892.

There are objections to this bill, however, that are to me insuperable. One is the provision of the bill, which will be found in more than one place in it, which judges all Chinese to be unworthy of credit. The act of 1892 required that the fact of his right to remain here shall be established by a white witness. This bill modifies that provision so as to require the testimony of "at least one credible witness other than Chinese." I can not, with my views of the rights of men, consent that any race, either on account of color or nativity, shall be adjudged by law to be unworthy of credit.

I know nothing in the world about the Chinese population. Many of them may be unworthy of credit, or all may be so, but I am not willing to agree that the testimony of a whole nationality is to be rejected because of any belief I entertain that none of them can be believed. In my own professional life I have known where witnesses were excluded from testifying on the ground of color. I know that those laws have been changed, and in the State in which I live there is now no exclusion of witnesses on the ground of color.

nesses on the ground of color.

I can not consent to this provision. I do not believe that all Chinese are liars. I do believe that juries and courts are competent to determine whether, in any given instance, a particular witness is credible or not. The bill in my judgment is radically defective on that ground. I will not consent that a witness shall be determined by law in advance, on account of his birth, to be unworthy of belief. I think such a provision is unworthy of our circlination. I do not know that in that view the pending hill is civilization. I do not know that in that view the pending bill is more objectionable than the act of 1892, but it assumes that every Chinese person of the classes here mentioned, who is found in this country, is here unlawfully, and it throws upon him the burden of proving his innocence.

It is said that the bill does not treat the presence of a native of China in this country as a crime. I am not able to see the dis-tinction between that which punishes an act as a crime and that which defines it to be a crime. What difference does it make to the imprisoned man whether that for which he is imprisoned is described by the law as a crime or misdemeanor or whether it is not treated as a crime at all? The man is punished by deportation in one instance and by imprisonment in the other stance; and when I am told that he is not charged with a crime I ask, if the consequences of the act result in suffering, in the deprivation of liberty, what difference does it make whether we call the act by some gentle name or by the sterner name of a

Again, Mr. President, it is possible that a Chinese citizen may be in this country lawfully. Every single Chinaman has the right to contest that question with the public authorities, and that contention of the Chinaman involves an issue of fact. issue of fact may be found against him upon insufficient evidence issue of fact may be found again by the nisi prius court. He ought to have a right to a reural of his cause by methods known to our law, by writs of error and whatever else the modes of procedure may be in the courts where the matter is determined. The person may for cause obtain a whitever eas the modes of procedure may be in the cours where the matter is determined. The person may for cause obtain a writ of certiorari from a superior court perhaps, or he may pre-sent his record to a judge of a supreme court who may give him a certificate, as is the practice in some of the States, because there may be errors prima facie. That person ought to have a right to return to his business and enjoy his liberty while the question is reheard. But the bill provides that he shall not be admitted to bail while this contest is going on; that he must remain in the question is reheard.

main in the custody of the marshal.

Now, it is said that this provision is possibly in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Mr. President, there are principles of justice, humanity, and right which are older and higher sanctions than constitutions. I do not inquire whether the Federal Constitution covers this particular case; but there are principles of justice and right to govern us which are older and I say form a higher obligation than the Constitution—the right of a man, while the question of his guilt is being considered, to give bail for his appearance to answer the judgment of the court when that judgment shall be rendered against him.

Why should this not be so? Why should all these men who are contesting their right to remain in this country be denied bail? I should be delighted to hear the reason. There is a right in the State courts (and it is very important that that right should be recognized) to deny bail where the proof is evident or the presumption is great, but there is no such question

The Chinese person is to be denied bail because of his nativity, that is all; because he was born in some other country, and he has found a country where the principles of justice are not observed, where the very law declares that he shall not have bail.

It is not to be left to the discretion of a judge. that the judges of the courts in California, or in the States where the Chinamen are present, possess the usual quantum of learnthe Chinamen are present, possess the usual quantum of learning, wisdom, and humanity. Why deny it to the judge? Provision might even be made that a judge shall, in his discretion, deny bail, or that the party shall be required to apply to a judge and the judge may, in his discretion, allow bail. Why, I say, make this bald, bold exception simply upon the ground that China is the spot on God's earth where this man was born, as if God did not govern the whole universe, and that the principles of night and justice ware not as extensive as quantien itself? of right and justice were not as extensive as creation itself?

I will spend no time in the argument of this question, but I am giving the reasons why this bill, in my judgment, ought not to be made a law by the Congress of the United States.

I repeat, first, because it assumes that all men of Chinese na-I repeat, first, because it assumes that all men of Chinese hat ivity are necessarily liars; that none of them can be believed; and that no judge and no jury shall be allowed to hear them be-cause they are conclusively and absolutely and essentially and necessarily untruthful. Then, again, I oppose the bill for other reasons that I have given. In my judgment it might be adapted to the end in view; it might be enacted with reference to well-established judicial principles; it might allow the courts to hear any testimony that might be offered, which there was any reason to believe, leaving to the courts and juries the duty of determin-ing whether in the particular instance the witness was or was not stating the truth, and then it might leave to the man who is subject to all of these inconveniences as the consequences of his act the privilege of giving ball for his appearance to answer the final judgment of the court.

of course the bill allows a very large class of officers to make arrests, I believe, without warrant. There is on the second page of the bill authority given to "any United States customs official, collector of internal revenue or his deputies, United States marshal or his deputies," to make arrests without formal com-plaint made before some judicial officer. The consequence would be that the person is left without remedy and is at the mercy of a large class of officers all over the States, officers who are more deputies, none of them elected, many of whom I know are irresponsible persons. These officers are allowed to capture a Chinaman who may be engaged in some lawful industry; and yet at the will of one of these subordinates he may be taken by the neck and brought before a judge; the case may be hard; no one of his countrymen can speak; although he may be as truthful as the Apostle Paul, none shall be allowed to speak for him, and a judgment of deportation is rendered. There may be errors of law and of fact in that judgment, because our judges are not infallible; and while that man is seeking a rehearing before the established tribunals of the country he remains in jail in the custody of the marshal until that question is tried.

Mr. President, we treat our thieves and burglars better than int. We presume them to be innocent until the contrary is established, and then we allow them bail. But simply because these men were born in another country and have come into this Christian land by authority, many of them rightfully here, even while the man is disputing the rightfulness of his remaining here he is condemned to jail until he proves his right to remain by testimony other than that of his own countrymen, who may know the fact, he is required to remain in the possession of the marshal until he succeeds in overcoming the presumption against

I can not vote for the bill. I do not believe that it is necessary for the protection of our fellow-citizens on the Pacific coast that we should violate the principles of justice and right. I will not consent to hold that men are necessarily liars because of their color. I will not consent that men who are contesting their rights by the due form of law shall be kept in jail without the privilege of bail. Having said this much, and having stated the reasons why I think the bill oughtnot to pass, although I presume it will, having discharged my duty in respect to it, I leave it to those who think that it is possible to find some authority under our Constitution and under that higher constitution of humanity to

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair).

The question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the object of that amendment is to repeal the legislation of 1888 and 1892, and to put in operation the statutes of 1882 and 1884, which were enacted for the purpose of carrying out the treaty of 1880. I do not rise for the purpose at this time of submitting any remarks to the Senate, but simply for the purpose of explaining the amendment. I understand that the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] proposes to address the Senate upon this subject, and also the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HoAR]. While I have some very clear and decided convictions upon this entire question, they are not irremovable, and I shall listen with great interest and attention to what the Senator from California has to say upon the subject.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I should perhaps content myself by remaining silent and simply casting my vote on this meas ure as an expression of the feelings of the people on the subject whom I have the honor in part to represent in the Senate; but it is a question of such vital moment, of such great importance not only to California, but to the whole country, that I feel I would be derelict in my duty if I did not briefly give my views, as I understand them, of the facts before us under consideration in the pending bill. I shall, however, in the discussion of the case presented by the bill, content myself with the general principles, leaving it to my colleague [Mr. White of California] to take up and argue the various phases of the question presented.

CALIFORNIA DOES NOT ASK AN EXTENSION.

I may say in the commencement, however, in answer to the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. Palmer], that the people of California are not asking for this bill. It is the Chinese and their attorneys who come here and ask for special legislation in their behalf. We are satisfied with the law as it now is upon our statute books and as it has been construed by the highest judicial tribunal of the land. It is the Administration that is asking for a special act of Congress to relieve the Chinese among us who have refused to obey the law of the land as it has been judicially construed by our highest tribunal.

The details of this question are most interesting, but in view of the very extended and various debates on this and similar bills in Congress, little has been left that has been unsaid. The measure in other forms has received consideration from the best minds of our land, and, though it has been strongly opposed by certain classes and sections, it has always been passed.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE QUESTION.

The subject is certainly an important one, and though the Pacific coast of our country is probably the most interested as yet, it is important to all sections, for unless the tide was stopped it might not be long before it took a turn and affected other sections as disastrously. Both sides have had their day, and in deed weeks and months in court, and the contributions therefrom have been very extensive and most exhaustive.

To the people of the Pacific States this is an old, old story believe that no one doubts us the right of protection, though in protecting ourselves it is arged we have not the right to injure the rights of others, especially as the others in this case are here by the power and right of a sacred treaty.

THE DANGERS ANTICIPATED WHEN THE TREATY WAS MADE

All kinds of opinions and all kinds of theories have found their way into this discussion since the adoption of the treaty in 1880. But it will be remembered by the conditions of that treaty we reserved the right to "limit or suspend the coming of the Chineso." There were fears then, by those who have examined the ness." There were lears then, by those who have examined the question, that there might be danger in it, and experience since has proven that the fears were not without foundation.

The various exclusion acts which have been passed are sufficient in everything, except that they do not exclude, and it was to enforce them and to remedy their imperfection that the act of Congress of May 5, 1892, was found necessary.

EXCLUSION ACTS DO NOT EXCLUDE.

Experience has demonstrated that the Scott exclusion act did not exclude, for the reason that it was deficient in not properly showing the Chinese who were here by right and who were here in violation of the law.

To ascertain exactly the Chinese who are here by right, it was proposed that they should be registered, the same as we are registered, before we have the privilege of voting at the various polls in the different States of the Union.

There were no harsh features or expense to the Chinaman in the remedy, which was simply intended to carry out our existing law, and which, under the treaty which we had entered into with that Government, we had the right to do, for it says, "to limit or suspend the coming of the Chinese." But the Chinese control to go the companion of the Chinese of the coming of the Chinese. refused to assist us in ascertaining who were here lawfully by declining to register and openly defying our laws. In this refusal they did not act on their own volition, but were governed by orders of their Chinese superiors, and not by the mandates of our courts or officials.

CHINESE NOT FREE AGENTS.

And here I desire to state one of the most important factors in this case. The great mass of the Chinese who are among us are not their own free agents, but they are controlled and gov-erned by organizations as separate and distinct from our own as China is distinct from the United States.

Many of these Chinese, to my own personal knowledge, were willing to register and were deterred only by fear of punishment by their respective companies. They recognized the fact that by their respective companies. They recognized the fact that they were subject to the law of the land in which they sojourned, and were in no sense superior to our people, that they were amenable to the laws and regulations of our Government, but the edict issued by their organizations which recognizes Chinese courts of control, the organizations and associations which own them and which control than was too newerful for them and them and which control them, was too powerful for them and so they refused to register. It is said in extenuation, that they now find they made a mistake, and that, if the time for registration extended according to the provisions of the pending bill, they will comply with the law and register.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from California who said that? Will the Senator specify who has said it? Mr. PERKINS. My friend from Oregon simply anticipates

Mr. PERKINS. My Habita from Oregon shiply anterpates the answer I am about to make.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well.

Mr. PERKINS. If it is not satisfactory, later on I shall be pleased to have the Senator ask that or any other question in relation to this subject-matter, for it is one in which our people are deeply interested, and if I can not answer satisfactorily I know that my colleague on the other side can do so; and therefore the Senator will not disturb or interrupt me in the least by asking any question relating to this subject.

THE PEOPLE DOUBT THE PROMISES OF THE CHINESE.

As I stated, it is possible that they will register, but judging from our past experience the people of California have great doubt about it, and I find that this doubt is not limited alone to the people of that State but to the people of the whole country who have a knowledge of the Chinese and their peculiar character; and it may not be long before there will be a demand for further legislation on the subject, as those who persist in refusing to register may continue to disregard our laws.

Petitions and memorials have been received here from the Chinese showing that they acted under legal advice, and now, that our courts have decided that this advice was bad, they indicate a disposition to comply with the law and register if a special act of Congress is enacted for their benefit.

SIX MONTHS' EXTENSION OF TIME ASKED.

Under these circumstances, this extension of six months is asked for, but what guaranty have we that the same legal advisers will not combat the law in their interest and again delay visers will not combat the law in their interest and again delay the registration the law compels beyond the time for which he present measure extends? Who makes the request for this extension of time? The Chinese Government, which is the only power that should ask it? Oh, no; it is asked by the attorneys who gave the Chinese the advice to defy the law. It is true that the Chinese minister has admitted that the "additional opportunity to register would afford his Government great satisfaction;" but there is no guaranty from him, and he gives no assurance or promise in all of the correspondence which has been submitted that the Chinese subjects will register. All that he submitted that the Chinese subjects will register. All that he says is contained in the communication asked for by Congress from the President, and submitted to us for our information a few days since.

WILL AFFORD THE CHINESE "GREAT SATISFACTION."

It is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In response to the resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, concerning the attitude of the Government of China with regard to an extension of time for the registration of Chinese laborers in the United States under the act of May 5, 1892, I transmit a report of the Secretary of State on the subject.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, October 18, 1893.

The PRESIDENT:

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the United States of the 10th instant, requesting the President, "if not incompatible with the public interest, to inform the Senate whether the Government of China has requested of the United States an extension of time for the regi tration of Chinese laborers in this country, as required by the act of Congress entitled 'An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States,' approved May 5, 1892, or has given to the United States any assurance that if the time for such registration shall be extended such Chinese laborers will register and take out certificates, and if such a request has been made or such an assurance has been given to transmit to the Senate copies of all correspondence concerning the same "—has the honor to lay before the President the following report, to the end that it may be communicated to the Senate should the President deem it proper so to do:

the honor to lay before the President the following report that way be communicated to the Senate should the President deem it proper so to do:

While the Government of China has not formally requested that the time for registration provided by the act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892, be extended, and no formal assurance has been given that if extended Chinese laborers in the United will take out certificates as provided by the act, the Chinese minister has repeatedly asserted, in conference with the undersigned, that his countrymen residing in the United States at the time of the passage of the act, on the advice of eminent counsel and in good faith, refrained from registering within the time allowed, and that it would be unjust to deny them another opportunity to register. The minister more than once has given assurance that an additional opportunity to register would afford his Government great satisfaction.

Respectfully submitted.

W. Q. GRESHAM.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.
Washington, October 11, 1893.

Perhaps, Mr. President, we should be gratified to know that Perhaps, Mr. President, we should be gratified to know that the "additional opportunity to register would afford the Chinese Government great satisfaction," but our people very properly demand more than this. It would gratify my colleague and myself exceedingly if we were able to say that the people of the Pacific States are pleased at the prospect, but we can not do so. They are not pleased, for they feel confident, reasoning from past experience, that this is but another form of delay, to postpone the enforcement of if not to abrogate the statutes of our land, which every good citizen of this Republic feels not only a and, which every good citizen of this Republic feels not only a legal obligation, but a moral obligation to obey.

THE CHINESE LIKELY TO AGAIN TEST THE LAW

The result will probably, then, be that the Six Chinese Companies that control, body and soul, the Chinese who are here among us, will again contest the pending measure should it become a law, and as it is an amended law, new issues can be joined. and the courts may place a different construction upon it from that which they placed upon the original law.

We would then be where we are now, and all because there is no guarantee about it, but simply because it would give the Chinese Government "great satisfaction." Possible delay and prospective postponement probably is the cause of the "great satisfaction.

The same eminent counsel, with the same "good faith" and good-sized fee will, in all probability give the advice which they desire. The Chinese are a peculiar, as they are in many respects a wonderful, people. One of our most humorous and versatile American writers has tersely photographed their character when he says:

Which I wish to remark, And my language is plain, That for ways that are dark And for tricks that are vain, The heathen Chinee is peculiar.

ONLY THE LOWER CLASSES COME TO US.

My own idea is, and my experience and observation tend to confirm the opinion, that it is only the lower classes of the Chinese who come here, and it is for this class that the bill proposes to legislate. They look at but few things as our people look at them. The great majority of them and their friends thought that Congress was not in earnest in passing the present registration law. They have an all-abiding faith and confidence in the use and power of money: and they imagined that by money they could defeat the provisions of the law by undue influences with our courts and our public officials.

There are honorable exceptions to all rules, but they have no conception, as a class of people, of the high moral law as we understand it. They think that everyone who has any connection with the carrying out of the law can be bribed, and that there is no such thing as honesty, principle, and character among our people, when weighed in the scale with money. Money is one of their idol gods, to which they pay homage and burn sacred incense.

WE SEEK ANY REMEDY TO CURE THE DISEASE.

Those who have thoroughly considered the subject-matter can have but little confidence in the pending bill doing any more than its predecessor did. But the disease is here, and our people are willing to adopt this or any remedy that will cure, or that even promises to cure it, though we would prefer something more. We would prevent the disease. Certain it is that the people of the Pacific coast are looking for a cure, for they paintally realize that the people of the Pacific coast are looking for a cure, for they paintally realize that they are a cure to be supported to the paintally realize that they are a cure to be supported to the paintally realize that they are a cure to be supported to the paintally realize that they are the they are fully realize that they are suffering from the dreadful scourge of Chinese immigration, and they are willing and anxious to secure a remedy.

NOTHING HUMILIATING IN THE PHOTOGRAPH.

Criticism has been made of the provision for photographing, and I regret that some of the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, which reported the bill, do not look with favor on the provision for photographing Chinamen and attaching the on the provision for photographing Chinamen and attaching the photograph to the certificate of registration. It is claimed by some that the photographing is very humiliating. There is nothing, Mr. President, in this criticism. The Chinaman himself never thought that there was anything humiliating in photographing and has never made any complaint. Humiliation can not enter or play any part in an organization which is as stoical as that of the Chinages. as that of the Chinese

The photographing clause is rather for the benefit of the Chinaman himself, as well as others, for there is no other way by which a registry of their description can be kept, that is, a registry that will amount to anything. They are not marked as other people are. They all have a tan-colored skin. They have black hair and almond-shaped eyes, and are about the same height and build. Place one thousand of them in a line and the same personal description will answer for every one of them.

It is impossible to make even a comparative guess of their ages with any degree of accuracy. The old and the middle-aged look so much alike, that men who have lived among them for years are applied to green within the confidence of the confidence unable to guess within ten or fifteen years of the age of a China-

Will the Senator from California allow me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.
Mr. DAVIS. If all that is true, of what use is a photograph?
Mr. PERKINS. I am about to come to that. My friend has simply anticipated. When I get through if I have not conclusively answered his question, I shall be glad to have him ask it again.

A PHOTOGRAPH EVEN WILL NOT IDENTIFY.

This similarity of appearance and features is not the case with any other people who come to our shores in very large numbers. Those who have given great attention to this matter have finally become convinced that there is no other way to distinguish them, and it is not claimed that even a photograph will always do this, for the features, the facial characteristics of many of them are so nearly identical, that the photograph will not always do what is needed. However, there is no better way under the sun that I know of, and I do not believe my friend from Minnesota can suggest a better mode than the photograph, though it is admitted that even the photograph is by no means satisfactory. The idea that the photographs are made up, as it has been charged, to adorn a "rogues' gallery" is simply nonsense and without reason.

No one has ever thought of such a thing except the astute attorneys of the Chinese, who seem to be so much more careful of their clients than the Chinese are themselves. For many years every Chinaman who has been convicted of any serious crime in California has been photographed. No other way has been found by which the keepers of the prison can identify them and thus be able to tell exactly when their terms of sentence have expired.

tence have expired.

This feature is, in the opinion of many, the most important in the law, and without it, it is almost certain that the law could not be enforced, for departing Chinamen by the thousands every year would leave this country and turn over their certificates of residence to others to come in. There is absolutely no other way of preventing such a traffic, except by the photograph, and that even will not work effectually in all cases.

HOW THE LAW MAY BE EVADED.

A few days since I received a letter from a well-informed friend in California, in which he pointed out how the Chinese intended to do even more registering, providing they decide to register at all, and if this bill passes to permit them to do it. He states the case so well that I quote from his letter:

By the extension of time for registration efforted by the McChange of the control of the

By the extension of time for registration afforded by the McCreary act-

That is the pending bill-every Chinaman will register no doubt—if their companies permit them—but he will not stop at one registration, he will register a half dozen times. For instance, Ah Jim will register at San Francisco to-day as Ah Jim. He will register the next day at Oakland or Merced as Ah Sin. His personal appearance may be a little different each time. As Ah Bum he registers the following day at Fresno, and Ah John the next day at San Francisco or some other city. Ah Jim may register twenty or one hundred times.

I notice that in the bill under consideration no penalty is attached to Ah Sin for having done this. He may register as many times as he pleases, provided he does not represent his name as Ah Sam when it is Ah Sin. There is no penalty; and so he can go through our State as a missionary of registration, furnishing certificates for his cousins and his cousins cousins who are to follow in his footsteps hereafter. So, as this friend writes, he may register twenty or a hundred times perhaps, and take the certificates and send them across to China to his brother or cousin and sell them for a few hundred dollars.

I remember reading a few days since the report of one of the immigration inspectors in New York stating that the Chinese are coming in from Cuba and the West Indies. We know they have been snuggled in from British Columbia. In such cases the certificates become invaluable to them. My correspondent continues:

He will take the extra certificates and send them to a broker in China, who will sell them for a couple of hundred dollars each.

The broker will have 400,000,000 to pick from, and as all the Chinese are smooth shaven ind look alike anyhow, it will not be difficult for the broker to find a man to fit each certificate. By the time the registration under the law closes we will have issued possibly a half million certificates and will thereby legalize the presence in this country of 400,000 Chinamen more than are here now.

my own mind that, even with the photograph, there will not be entire safety, and without it there would be none whatever. Too much care can not be given in this matter to the meaning of the terms "laborer" and "merchant," for upon that much of the success of the operation of the law will depend. whole matter we are dealing with a very remarkable class of people, a people whose cunning has no bounds. A Chinese laborer for a fee of from $20 to $50 can become a member of a merchants' firm, say the firm of Quong Lee Long & Co. firm, for the sum named and other sums, may have already over 100 members, and about the only business done by the firm is merchandising in Chinese. There is no limit to their number, and all who have the money can become "coöperative members" and receive from it and similar firms certificates of membership. Such certificates have already been used in the courts for the admission of Chinese who had no right to land on our shores, and they will continue to be used unless the strictest possible construction of the word "laborer" is maintained.

NOT A PARTISAN POLITICAL QUESTION

The immigration of the Chinese into this country has long since ceased to be a partisan political question. Men of all par ties and creeds who have a knowledge of these people agree that they are a blight upon our industries and citizenship, and an injury to our people. At the general election held in the fall of 1879 in California, in accordance with a statute providing therefor, the question was submitted to the people of that State "for" and "against" the policy of permitting the unrestricted immigration of Chinese to continue, and out of a total vote of 161,405 there were deposited in the ballot box only 883 votes for such immigration. Every day since that election has served only to convince the then almost unanimous opinion of our people that they were right. The Chinese do not, they can not, they will not assimilate with us.

THE CHINESE WILL NOT LEARN.

They know nothing about our free Government, our standard of civilization, or American citizenship, and they care less. They know nothing and care nothing about our institutions, and they have no desire to learn about them. Our people of California believe in churches, in schools, in families, and the home; these are our citadels of liberty. The Chinese, on the contrary, care nothing about such matters. They have, it is true, a labor to sell, but it is a servile labor, a slave labor, for they are field down by contracts of their own making, which places them in a condition worse than slavery; their servitude can never end. They take no more interest in our affairs than if they were not here. It matters not how long they remain with us, they go away ignorant of our American institutions, simply because they do not want to learn.

THE PROPLE WILL YIELD NO FURTHER.

For fear that we might in some way violate our treaty obligations our people have yielded point after point in favor of the Chinese. They do not want to yield any further, and insist that the law shall be enforced. They want a law so adjusted and severe in its penalties that it can not be evaded or discarded or openly violated. They know that the ordinary Chinaman, by some mysterious process of reasoning, thinks that he represents a higher plane of civilization than our people occupy, and they want provisions enacted which will prevent them from clandescoming into this country against the laws of our land. But they also recognize the fact, for fact it is, that the enormity of this question is not understood or realized on this side of the mountains, for out of the 107,000 Chinese in this country, according to the last census, nearly 80,000 of them are living in Cali-

AN UNDESIRABLE, A CONTENTION-PRODUCING PEOPLE.

The Chinese are an undesirable class of people. This is tho unprejudiced judgment of people who know them, after years of experience. They are, it is admitted, a remarkable people in many respects, and many things can be said in their favor, for no one can be so biased as not to recognize this, but on the whole, considering their good and their bad points, we would be much better off if they had never come among us, or if they would now go back again. Many industries that depend upon their labor would, it is admitted, temporarily suffer in California, but in time these would right themselves. Their presence among us has kept up a continual contention that has done us steady harm. It has caused factions among ourselves, politically and religiously, and it has created misunderstandings and sec tional strifes that have resulted injuriously to our common interests. It has separated us, and it had caused us to some extent to lose confidence in each other's judgment. Bitter quarrels have resulted from their presence and, worse than all, the morals of our youth, the promise of the future manhood of our country, have been underminded, for it has happened that, contrary to the experience with the people of other nations, our youth have copied only the injurious traits and habits of the Chinese. They have copied their vices instead of their virtues. In this respect it is hardly possible to calculate the injury the Chinese have done us, and those who are to follow us.

THE CHINESE A VIOLATOR OF OUR LAWS.

The Chinese have no respect for our laws, they violate our laws greatly out of proportion to any other number of people among us. In this connection I desire to state that I have recently received a letter from the chief of police of San Francisco, glving his experience in that city, which is a fair index of other cities relating to the Chinese. He has occupied the position for nearly half of his lifetime, and is one of the most faithful and conscientious officers in the performance of his duty. He has the respect and confidence of all who know him, and his opinion upon this question can be taken as the truth so far as it relates to his personal experience with the Chinese. He

DEAR SIR: Replying to your communication of the 11th instant, asking he percentage of crime committed by Chinese as against that of all other lasses and requesting my opinion about the influence for evil that the hinese have upon our young people, you are informed that the number of hinese arrested for ten years ending June 30, 1893, is 20,000.

The principal offenses committed by Chinese are "burglary," "larceny." "robbery." "murder," and "assault to murder;" "keeping oplum dens," gambling," "violating health and fire ordinances;" in fact they commit about every offense known to law.

In the cases of all other classes arrested about 70 per cent are charged with drunkenness.

There are a number of secret societies here whose members are principally composed of highbinders, and whose object is to levy blackmail upon their countrymen, and, when not successful at that, they commit murder. I tried with all the ingenuity I possessed to break up those societies in a legal way, but by their cunning, "of which they can beat the world," I did not succeed.

Their ourrageous acts became so numerous that the press attacked the very severely and forcibly, which caused me to assume the responsibility of sending a squad of police to raid their meetings, in which the united press indorsed my action.

I estimate the Chinese population to be at least 15,000, and will increase before the winter sets in, because they flock to this place at that senson from all over the coast.

P. CROWLEY, Chief of Police

Hon. GEORGE C. PERKINS, United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

THE LAW DOES NOT FORCE THEM OUT OF THE COUNTRY.

These things are sufficient for consideration by themselves, but they are not exactly what we should consider now. The Chinese are here; they are here in large numbers; and they are here under our pledge that they are to receive the same protection as the people of the most favored or desirable nation.

It was not intended by the present law to force them out to remove those who are here rightfully, but to prevent the further coming of a class which are admittedly objectionable. The existing law requires those who are here to be registered, so that if any are found hereafter without being able to show a certificate of registry, it can be presumed that they are here without right, in violation of the provisions of the treaties and our laws.

VE ARE OPPOSED TO THE FURTHER COMING OF A BAD CLASS We do not desire to allow the number of Chinese of the lower classes—the coolies—to be increased in this country. No people more than those of the Pacific coast recognize the value and nobility of labor, for "honest labor bears a lovely face," and no people ever had so much of it to do, to build up the homes they now enjoy, to build up a great Commonwealth on the wastern shores of this continent, as the people of our State. They had to dig out of the rock the gold and silver that has enriched the world, and they had to level mountains in doing so. They culword, and they had to level mountains in doing so. They can trivated the fields, they planted the vines and trees that now furnish breadstuffs and fruit to all parts of the world. The tremendous labor they performed, and are performing, is a surprise to the world, and it was only by it that they made their civilization possible and secured the comforts which they enjoy to-day. There are none among them who do not glory in the results of labor. But there is labor and labor. The labor given by the Chinese is a debasing, a degrading labor. Why, sir, one of the principal curses of slavery in our midst in this fair land was, that the labor of the slave degraded instead of elevated our people, that it injured instead of benefited all who came in contact with it. Just so is the servile contract labor given by the Chinese. It produces results? Yes, but the results are not satisfactory; the results are obtained at the sacrifice of American citizenship.

A GREATER CURSE THAN AMERICAN SLAVERY.

I think that the servile contract labor of the Chinese is a I think that the servile contract labor of the Chinese is a a greater curse upon this land than African slave labor ever was. The man who owned a slave had a pecuniary interest in keeping him healthy, in providing for him. It was to his own financial interest to do this. But the employer of the Chinese contract laboror cares for him only so long as he renders him service for the money he pays. It is more degrading, more debasing, more demoralizing to our people, if that is possible, than ever the slave labor of this country was.

What have we passed through in this land to wipe out the curse of slavery? Can we not read the lesson in history written in fire, in blood from the veins of the brightest men in this land to wipe out that great curse? Can we not profit by that lesson, and say here to-day, thus far shall you go, but no further shall the servile contract labor of China pollute this great Republic?

A LABOR THAT INJURES RATHER THAN BENEFITS.

A LABOR THAT INJURES RATHER THAN BENEFITS

The labor performed by the Chinese has injured far more than it has benefited, either in California or any other State in this Union. It is not the labor that America demands and that her people have a right to expect and receive. It pulls down from that high position of dignity which labor should occupy and degrades it and keeps it down. It breeds contentions, it suggests and encourages difficulties, and it exasperates on all sides. It is not ennobling, it is not good, and it is not satisfactory. Labor is honorable, it matters not whether it is performed with the pick and shovel, by the sailor who mans the vessel, by the farmer and shovel, by the sailor who mans the vessel, by the farmer who tills the soil, by the tool of the mechanic, the delicately adjusted instruments of the astronomer, or the scalpel of the surgeon. Labor is always honorable, but there is a great difference, there is an insufferable gulf, between labor and the work of the Chinese.

THE CURSE OF CHINESE LABOR

Everyone who has watched the progress of both has long since observed that the curse of Chinese labor is that it is not independent, that it is secondary to other factors than that of the employer and the employes. It makes room for an intermediary, employer and the employes. It makes room for an intermediary, and it lacks the efficacy, the dignity of true labor, because it is deficient in the essentials.

Under our treaty (and we have not and we do not want to vio-late any portion of it, either in spirit or letter) we are compelled legally and morally to protect the Chinese who are here with us, and we have and will continue to do so while they are among us. Acting under that treaty, and its provisions were ample, our peo-ple thought they had a right, they knew they had a right, they believed it for the best interest of this country to exclude Chinese immigration, which we had a right to do under its provi-

We also want to enforce the exclusion act to the letter, and to We also want to enforce the exclusion act to the letter, and to aid us in that we enacted the registry law. And more than this, we want to stop continual agitation. We want to have this Chinese question settled once for all time. We want a rest and a chance to try the supposed benefit of the workings of the registration act. We want to put a stop to the oft-repeated cry of injustice to the Chinese; to the idea that the people of California (and I want to say that the people of California are the equal of any in moral character, in beneficence, in philanthropy, in enterprise, in all things that go towards making up good American citizenship, of any neonle in the world) are cruel towards terprise, in all things that go towards making up good American citizenship, of any people in the world) are cruel towards the Chinese. They are a people who compare in the most favorable light as a class with any in this great Republic.

It is unjust to them that an erroneous impression on this subject should get over the land. It is to them a great injustice, and it prevails not only here in the Atlantic States but in Europe and elsewhere. We have been misrepresented. No Chinamer have ever hear they accounted on injusted on injustice, in the care hear they are accounted on injusticed the contraction. man has ever been there assaulted or injured or has been in any greater danger at any time of being assaulted or injured than any citizen of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Our people will not tolerate, and have never tolerated, and have no disposition to wrong the humblest resident among them, no matter whether he comes from the isles of the Pacific, from China, or from any other country.

EVERY CHURCH A BEACON LIGHT OF CIVILIZATION.

We want to convince the good people of our own land. We nize that every church is a beacon light of civilization and is a nize that every church is a beacon light of civilization and is a bond for law and good society and the sanctity of the home, and that, while the petitioners are undoubtedly actuated by the very best of motives and purposes, they are entirely unacquainted with the people for whom they so eloquently plead.

Kind-hearted, benevolent, and Christian men and women in California and the other Pacific States have organized in their churches, Sabbath schools and aid societies, with a view to Christianize the Chinese, but I think it is safe to say that not 2 percent of the Chinese, after thirty years of earnest effort, have been converted to Christianity. It is clearly a case of love's labor last.

CHINESE WORSHIP OF THE EVIL ONE.

The Chinese have their joss houses, their places of worship in every block in Chinatown. They burn incense to their gods. They pay homage to the evil one, because they say the God we They pay homage to the evil one, because they say the God we teach them to worship can do no wrong, and, therefore, if they can get on good terms with the evil one they are all right, and so they pay tribute to him. But it is not the highest motive which prompts men to be good only because they fear punishment hereafter. I do not think much of that religious sect or that man who embraces religion only because he fears the punishment which will come to him if he does not embrace it; rather et him embrace religion because its teachings are good and be utiful and elevating, and because God is love.

Mr. President, the people of California are generous to a fault; they are not engaged in any war against the Chinese. They are engaged, however, in something higher and nobler—in a contest to protect themselves, their reputation, their homes, and their youth from the contaminating influences of a people who are debasing to all who come within their radius. They do not want to strike one blow at the Chinese, but they do want to save themselves from the blighting influences which the Chinese have instituted in our midst; they do want to enforce that protection which the laws give them, and to palliate, if possible, the operations of a treaty which this country has made, and which has been found to work most injuriously to their interests.

OUR PEOPLE A CHURCH-GOING PEOPLE.

The people of California, and of the adjoining States are a cosmopolitan, but a law-abiding and high moral class, and they are a church-going people. They may be, and probably are, more broad-minded and care less about what particular form of religion is taught than people in other parts of the country, but religion is taught than people in other parts of the country, but they sympathize with every religious faith, sect, or creed which has for its object the bettering of the people and the elevation of their moral character. They have suffered from the Chinese, though in many instances they may have been benefited indi-vidually by their presence. They are anxious that the regis-tration law shall be enforced as a means of preventing more Chinese from coming among us.

tration law shall be enforced as a means of preventing more Chinese from coming among us.

There are enough Chinamen in this country now to experiment on, and our people are not willing that the experiment shall be conducted on any larger scale. Experience has demonstrated to them the evil of this great influx of these undesirable people, and they appeal to Congress for the remedial legislation which the registration and exclusion act promised.

It is not a literation of desirable to the end of the en

It is not my intention or desire to discuss this measure at this time in a more detailed manner. There are so many objections to the Chinese that a mere recital of them would occupy much more time than it would be proper or fitting for me to claim.

WILL NOT BECOME PERMANENT RESIDENTS

The Chinese are undesirable for many causes; but among the principal ones is the fact that their stay with us is only a passing event, and that none of them hope or expect to become permanent residents among us. They add nothing to our prosperity and take everything they earn back to their own country. They would not, if they could, become citizens, and they are so careful about this that everyone of them comes here with a contract that in the event of his dying here his bones shall be sent back to the lead of his everyone. to the land of his ancestry.

That is why I used the expression that the Chinese Six Companies own the Chinamen body and soul. They think they would never go to the flowery land of their ancestors if their bones were permitted to remain here upon our soil; and so, in the contracts which they make, it is stipulated that their bones shall be sent back, and every steamer which leaves the port of San Francisco and the port of Victoria, on Puget Sound, carries back boxes and boxes of the bones of these dead Chinamen.

AN UNHOLY CONTRACT.

I will add that the Chinese differ in this respect from every other class of people who come among us. The contract which is made is not one of filial love or brotherly affection. The last want to convince the church-going people, who have so numerously petitioned Congress in behalf of the Chinese, that the people of California are in full sympathy with them for the stand they take for good government and good morals. They recogisting the bones of Chinamen is not done by some service of shipping the bones of Chinamen is not done by some service of shipping the bones of Chinamen is not done by some people with the service of shipping the bones of Chinamen is not done by some people with the convince the church-going people, who have so numerously petitioned Congress in behalf of the Chinese, that the people of California are in full sympathy with them for the stand they take for good government and good morals. The United States collector of internal revenue in San Francisco, and also some of the ablest statisticians of the leading journals of the West have made a computation, and they estimate-and they are very competent to do so-that the Chinese have sent or taken back to China in the thirty years they have been in this country the enormous sum of $810,000,000. This, in the minds of those who have had experience with the Chinese, is sufficient to satisfy them that the Chinese, leaving all other questions aside, are undesirable, not to use a harsher

I have not gone into the details of this question to show in what manner these people live and how they are crowded to-gether, contrary to all sanitary laws and to all regulations which everyone recognizes who wishes to enjoy health. I shall not attempt to describe to you their food, 96 per cent of which consists of rice and tea. They contribute nothing to the support of our country. I shall not weary the Senate with these details.

DEGRADING TO AMERICAN MANHOOD. In answer to what I have said it may be replied, "they have contributed of their labor, have they not? They benefited you by giving you their services in building canals, in building railroads, in cultivating the land, and in building ditches." Yes, I must answer in the affirmative; but as I have said before it is a contract, a servile labor, which is contrary to our laws and which is degrading to American manhood. It is, I repeat, a labor more humbling and more debasing than slave labor. If the same labor had been given to others—and it would have been except for the presence of the Chinese—the result of the labor would have been left in our country by those who, from love of our institutions, would have become citizens of this great Republic; who would have built up their homes, raised their families, supported our public schools and other institutions, and thus have become factors in this great Government.

THOUGHTFUL PEOPLE DEMAND EXCLUSION. The demand for exclusion, and for registration as a means of aiding the exclusion, I reiterate does not come from the so-called "hoodlums" and "sand-lotters," of whom so much has been printed in the public press in the Atlantic cities; but it comes from the thoughtful people of our State, who are most interested; it comes from the fathers, from the mothers, from the guardians of the youth of the State, and from those who are interested in the advancement and prosperity of this great country. It is a universal demand, and it is for this reason that I do not think the Chinese have any claim upon the country or upon Congress to ask for this extension of the law which they have violated deliberately, intentionally, and contrary to the mandates of Con-

But, Mr. President, in marked contrast to those who have refused to obey the law, in marked contrast with the Chinese, I wish to say that the people of the Pacific coast, from the State of Washington to California, all over that beautiful land which waters the western part of this great Union of States, will bow in submission to the will of Congress, for they are a law-abiding,

We of the sunset land of the nation have an abiding faith in the wisdom, justice, and patriotism of our fellow-citizens of these great United States. We believe that as soon as you investigate and understand the real question at issue we shall have your national properties in particular from our midst this sympathy and cooperation in banishing from our midst this growing evil.

STAND SHOULDER TO SHOULDER AND REPEL ANY INVASION.

As common citizens of a progressive Republic it is our duty to stand shoulder to shoulder in repelling the invasion of not only the coolie of Asia, but also the pauper, the criminal, and the contract laborer of Europe. Let our school bells ring out their peals from hill and dale, from the mountains to the sea, from every hamlet in the land, that we have resolved it to be our bounden duty, first, to educate and rear the children of our own citizens and prepare them for the high duty of American citizenship, before we permit others to come in and usurp their

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON WORLD'S FAIR EXHIBITS.

Mr. CULLOM. Before another Senator addresses the Senate on the pending bill I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved April 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition, which has come from the other House and been referred to the Com-

The joint resolution refers to foreign goods on exhibition at Chic go, and the proposition is to reduce the customs duties to one-half on all the goods there at the time of the passage of the joint resolution. I am informed by members of the committee that they are not in favor of any of the provisions of the joint resolution but the last clause, which reads as follows:

And provided further, That all foreign exhibits at such Fair acquired by contribution or purchase by the Columbian Museum of Chicago for its own use shall be wholly released from all customs duties.

The portion which I have read is all of the joint resolution which I desire to have passed at this time. Since the approach of the close of the World's Fair there has been organized what is known as the Columbian Museum of Chicago; and as Senators have probably noticed from the press, Mr. Field, a very prominent merchant there, has contributed a million dollars, and many foreigners are disposed to give or to sell articles which have been on exhibition, which they prefer should go into that I think, under the circumstances, the portion of the joint resolution which I have read should be allowed to pass, if not all of I ask that the joint resolution be taken up for consideration, with a view of securing that provision at least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to state that the Senator from Illinois was not quite correct when he said that all the members of the Finance Committee objected to the provisions of the joint resolution. Speaking for myself, I wish to say that I am in favor of each and every provision contained in it. At the same time I take no exception to the action taken by the Senator. I think he is quite right in saying that a majority of the committee are opposed to the resolution in its entirety.

Mr. CULLOM. I ought to have said that the committee was not favorable to the passage of the entire joint resolution, and I stand corrected by the Senator from New Jersey. All I ask is that the joint resolution may be taken up and that all of it may be stricken out but the last clause.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. So far as I am individually concerned, I have not looked at the joint resolution particularly, and I do not know that I have any objection to it, but it seems to me that at least the chairman of the Committee on Finance ought to be present before any action is taken, as the joint resolution has not been considered in the committee for amendment, and has not been acted on favorably by the committee. and has not been acted on favorably by the committee

Mr. MORRILL. I think the Senator from Illinois had better allow the joint resolution to remain until the chairman of the committee returns to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. In justice to myself I desire to say that I consulted with the chairman of the committee before I saw any of the other members of the committee, and told him it would be a little odd for me, not being a member of the committee, to report the joint resolution.

Mr. MORRILL. The joint resolution can not be considered by the Senate without first discharging the Committee on Finance from its further consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not seek to press the joint resolution if any Senator objects to it; but I saw the chairman of the committee [Mr. VOORHEES], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson], and I supposed it was perfectly proper for me to submit the motion I have.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I should not object to the present consideration of the joint resolution individually, but I do not consideration of the joint resolution individually, but I do not believe that the practice of passing measures in this way, which have not been considered by committees, is a good one; and I think it ought not to be indulged in.

Mr. CULLOM. I should not have requested that the resolution be taken up but for the fact that I am anxious to go away, and I was desirous that the little provision to which I have referred, should at last be saved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Illinois.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. I) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEARY, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. FLETCHER managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H.R.1) to repeal a part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes;"

A joint resolution (S. R. 36) transferring the exhibit of the Navy Department, known as the model battle ship Illinois, to the State of Illinois, as a naval armory for the use of the naval militia of the State of Illinois, on the termination of the World's Columbian Exposition.

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BRIDGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate and asking for a committee of conference thereon.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. VEST, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. FRYE were appointed.

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I do not care to weary the Senate at this time by discussing the character of Chinese laborers ate at this time by discussing the character of Chinese laborers in this country, the undesirability of a large number of them here, the history of the Chinese here, or of the legislation intended to restrict or prohibit the coming of Chinese laborers to this country. At an early day in the session, knowing that the Chinese question was an important one and would immediately demand the attention of the Administration, and probably of Congress, I took occasion to discuss the se-called Geary act, and the necessity for an appropriation for its faithful execution.

I took occasion then to advert to the fact that under our form of government the powers of government are divided between three great departments, and that the power to make laws is exclusively conferred upon Congress; that the executive has no discretion but to enforce a law of Congress, and that the President is as much bound by a law of Congress as the most humble

As I said on that occasion, the extending the time for Chinese laborers to register is not incompatible with the general purpose of the so-called Geary law. That the purpose of that act was to enable the Government to distinguish between the Chinese laborers lawfully in this country and those who had or should come into the country unlawfully. It was supposed that a system of registration was the only practicable method by which the Government might be enabled to do so.

I then explained my connection with the so-called Geary law, the fact that I had agreed to a provision for registration under a sort of compulsion, all the existing legislation in regard to the coming of Chinese laborers into this country being about to expire by limitation; that I had drawn a provision which differed materially from a similar provision contained in the bill as it came to the Senate from the House of Representatives: and that, in my judgment, as finally enacted into law, it was neither a violation of the treaty with China, nor was it degrading to the Chinese in this country. I took occasion then to say, and I repeat it now, that the only palpable violation of the treaty with China in regard to the coming of Chinese laborers into this country was the so-called Scott exclusion law of October 1, 1888. I then described the manner in which that measure had been introduced into Congress, and had been passed. I propose now to fortify my statement in regard to the character of that measure by reading a quotation from the speech of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Telller] made in the Senate the day after the Scott bill came into Senate. He said:

Now. Mr. President, what is the condition of this bill and what are the circumstances under which it comes to us? Yesterday, as the Senate was proceeding with its business in the usual way, there came in a bill which I learn now has never seen a committee of any body, of either this House or of any other. It never ran the gauntlet that every bill runs of criticism; it has never been printed. I do not know that I am at liberty to say who introduced it in the House of Representatives. I do not know how far I can go upon a question of that kind. I can state what I have seen in the public press, and I suppose I have a right to read what is in the RECORD, and if I have perhaps I have the right to say that this appears to have been introduced by a gentleman who is not a member of the committee that generally takes cognizance of these things, not only not a member of the committee, but I may say without offense to him, a gentleman that in no sense and under no circumstances has a right to speak for American labor.

Without going to a committee the bill goes through the House and comes here. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Butler] said with great frankness that it was a political movement. I do not find in the Record that this bill was drawn in the Solicitor's office, but I hear it outside. I hear that it was sent down from the executive department of the Government in hot haste to the House of Representatives to be passed. I do not know that that is so; I only say that that is the rumer, that is the report. I submit to the Senate, however, that it does not take very much to make one believe that in the quick passage of this bill through the House of Representatives there was something more than a desire to protect American labor against the incursions of Aslatic labor.

If I were to look over the whole House and select a man who would most fitly represent the American people who toil, I should hardly have thought of selecting the man who came hot haste with that bill and who succeeded in passing it through the House a very few men would have been able to do, and he succeeded only because he is a high priest in the Democratic clurch. It is a bill which could only have been considered by the unantmous consent of the House, the Speaker's recognition being first had. This occurred immediately on the reading and approval of the Journal. He sicceeded only because he represents the President of the United States more than any other man in the Democratic party, as he did at St. Louis and as he does everywhere, and who is reported to have contributed ten times as much money to the campaign fund as his Democratic President has given. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I know that so far as he is concerned if he chooses to give $100,000 to the Democratic

Mr. President, I read this in confirmation of my statement as to the manner in which the Scott bill was introduced into Congress, and as to the character of the bill. I do this because the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] said in substance a few minutes ago on this floor—I shall not attempt to quote his exact language—that great injustice had been done to China and the Chinese people

Following the history of the Scott law in the Senate, I find that it was passed in the Senate by 37 votes, with only 3 nays, Senator Brown of Georgia, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON], and that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] voted for it in the Senate.

If any injustice has ever been done to China in the legislation which has been enacted to restrict the coming of Chinese laborers to this country, it was done by the Scott law. If any injustice was done in the act of May 5, 1892, to China, if there was any violation of treaty, it was in continuing the Scott law for ten years longer under that act.

I agree with those who think that the Scott law violated the treaty. It violated the treaty because under the treaty the Chineselaborers who were already in this country were given the right to go and return at their own free will, but under the Scott law that privilege was cut off entirely as to the Chinese laborers in this country.

Mr. GRAY. Did the Senator vote for the Scott law? Mr. DOLPH. I did, and on a famous I did, and on a former occasion I gave my reasons for it, and do not care to repeat them.

It was an attempt to get the Republicans for political purposes in a hole, and we resolved to let the Administration extricate itself as best it could.

I repeat that if the act of May 5, 1892, was a violation of the treaty or was unjust to the Chinese Government or to Chinese subjects in this country, it was from the fact that it extended the Scott act for ten years longer, and that the Scott act was a pal-pable violation of the treaty. It not only took away from Chi-nese laborers lawfully in this country, who had a right under the treaty of November 17, 1880, to go and come at free will, to leave the country and return, but it cut off the right of Chinese laborers who had departed from this country with certificates entitling them to return from the right to return, and invalidated their certificates. I think that something over 20,000 Chinese laborers at the time the act was passed were out with certificates entitling them to return.

I am not going to defend the Scott law; I will not deny that it was a violation of the treaty. For that act, I say, the Sanator from Delaware voted, and if there was any violation of the treaty with China in the act of 1892, it was by the extension of the Scott act.

The proposition that the provision of the detay, or in registration was degrading or a violation of the treaty, or in registration was degrading or a violation of the treaty, or in the maintained. We had the anyway unjust to China, can not be maintained. We had the right, under our treaty with China, to restrict and prevent the coming of Chinese laborers into this country.

The treaty, and the laws which we had passed in pursuance of the treaty, to prevent the coming of Chinese laborers to this country were openly and systematically violated by the Chinese and their representatives in this country, and thousands of Chi-nese laborers, those who had been out at the time the Scott act was passed with certificates, and others who had never been in this country, and never had a right to come into this country, were being smuggled every day in the year into this country across the boundary between Mexico and the United States and between British Columbia and the United States, and by steam-ships coming into our ports upon the Pacific coast. The United States having a right to restrict the coming of Chinese laborers into this country, had the right to enact all necessary legislation to enable it to do so.

If a system of registration was necessary to enable the Government to distinguish between those Chinese lawfully here and those coming unlawfully into this country, certainly the Gov-ernment had the right under the treaty to enact such a pro-vision for registration. The pretense that that provision was either in violation of the treaty or was degrading to the Chinese or unjust to China, can not be maintained. It was no more degrading to the Chinese than the provision that a citizen of the United States, as I said on a former occasion, should be compelled to register in order to be entitled to vote in his own State or in his own municipality, no more degrading than the requirement of a foreign government that a citizen of the United States shall bring a passport from his government to be entitled to enter or remain within the jurisdiction of that foreign government.

The 13,000 Chinese laborers who did register under that act have not been degraded; on the contrary, they have been bene-flted. They carry about with them the highest evidence of their right to be here and to remain here unmolested, a shield for their protection.

Mr. President, having said so much in regard to the provision for registration, I desire to say that I have not been very willing to excuse the defiant refusal of the Six Companies to comply with it. It was not the Chinese Government which objected to registration. The Chinese Government hast roubled itself very little about this matter of registration. It was not the Chinese laborers who refused to register; they were quite willing to register: it was their masters, the Chinese Six Companies, who gave out their orders that the Chinaman should not register.

I have felt from the start, and that has been my trouble with this bill, that it was not consistent with the dignity of the United States, unasked by the Chinese Government, without any request from any Chinese authority, without even a request from the Chinese subjects in this country, to voluntarily back down, and in the face of the defiance of a class of aliens in this country who have refused to comply with a law of Congress to grant them an extension of time.

I not only discussed that matter in the speech I made early in the session, but I introduced in the Senate a resolution calling for information upon the subject, in order that there might be no mistake as to whether the Chinese Government had or had not asked for this legislation. The answer to that is as follows, without reading the whole of it:

While the Government of China has not formally requested that the time for registration provided by the act of Congress entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892, be extended, and no formal assurance has been given that if extended, Chinese laborers in the United States will take out certificates as provided by the act, the Chinese minister has repeatedly asserted, in conference with the undersigned, that his countrymen residing in the United States at the time of the passage of the act, on the advice of eminent counsel and in good faith, refrained from registering within the time allowed, and that it would be unjust to denythem another opportunity to register. The minister more would afford his Government great satisfaction.

I read from the letter of the Secretary of State in response to a resolution offered by myself.

Mr. President, notwithstanding I have felt that a vigorous prosecution of the law of Congress would have brought the mutter to the attention of China, so that the Chinese

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator a question?
Mr. DOLPH. I will hear the Senator.
Mr. GRAY. The Senator is from the Pacific coast, and knows a great deal more about these matters than we on this side of the continent would be expected to know. Am I to understand that the Senator from Oregon is, under the circumstances, opposed to extending the time for registration?

Mr. DOLPH. I shall come to that.
Mr. GRAY. I want to know if I am to understand that from what the Senator has said?

Mr. DOLPH. I shall come to that point directly. Mr. GRAY. Can not the Senator answer either "yes" or "no"? Mr. DOLPH. No: I will not answer "yes" or "no". I do not choose to answer just now.

Mr. GRAY. All right.
Mr. DOLPH. I had already stated that there was no serious objection in my mind to the extension of the time of registration, it not being inconsistent with the purpose of the original act; that the purpose of the act of May 5, 1892, was not the decrease of the constitution were consistent with the purpose of the act of May 5, 1892, was not the decrease of the constitution when the constitution were consistent with the purpose of the constitution when the constitution were consistent with the constitution when the constitution were constituted as the constitution when the constitution when the constitution when the constitution when the constitution were constituted as the constitution when the constitution when the constitution were constituted as the constitution when the constitution when the constitution were constituted as the constitution when the constitutio portation of Chinese, but that that provision for deportation was merely intended to provide a punishment for a violation of the act. My trouble had not been because I was unwilling, upon a proper application from China, to grantan extension of the time for registration, but because I did not like this Government being put in the attitude of voluntarily yielding to the defiant opposition of a class of aliens in this country. Mr. GRAY rose.

Mr. DOLPH. Let me finish. This measure, it is understood

Mr. DOLPH. Let me inish. This measure, it is understood, was prepared in the State Department. It is understood to be an Administration measure; that it is desired by the Administration and the responsibility for it is, of course, upon the political majority in Congress. If they choose to put the Government in the attitude in which this bill will put it. I have constants and the extension of time cluded to make no opposition to the extension of time claded to make no opposition to the extension of time.

Mr. GRAY. Now, may I ask the Senator again, because I think we ought to deal fairly with each other about this—

Mr. DOLPH. I think I have answered the question.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator comes from a part of the country where he has opportunities of understanding this question which we in the East have not. Whe ther it is an Administration measure or not, I ask whether the Senator's judgment approves it.

Mr. DOLPH. I never would have introduced a bill or layers.

Mr. DOLPH. I never would have introduced a bill or favored Mr. DOLPH. I never would have introduced a bill of layoreda bill in committee or reported a bill to the Senate, providing for an extension of time to register unless China had asked for a modification of the act of 1892. I would not put this country in the attitude of backing down in the face of the defiant opposition of atiens in this country—after the law, which was enacted for the purpose of being observed by them, had been defied; but I am willing to consent, and I have consented, to the report of this bill from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and its enactment here, as it appears to be a measure asked for by this Administration. I shall make no factious opposition to it, indeed I propose to vote for it.

Mr. GRAY. But the Senator will not give us the benefit of his judgment about it?

Mr. DOLPH. I have answered that, and if my answer is not

Mr. DOLPH. I have answered that, and it my answer is not satisfactory to the Senator, he must go without an answer. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to another matter. It the response of the Secretary of State to the resolution of inquiry offered by myself is deemed satisfactory, if there is sufficient excuse in that for the legislation now proposed to be enacted, if the dignity of this Government is preserved, or if it is deemed proper as a matter of grace or good will toward China is deemed proper as a matter of grace or good will toward Chin to extend the time, then I think that as a matter of grace if would have been better not to have incumbered this bill with other provisious which must be unsatisfactory to the Chines Government, and I favored the amendment and the reporting this bill embracing simply the first section, extending the time If we are to extend the time for registration, if we are to make a peace offering to China, I do not believe it is wise to couple it with additions to the Geary law which must be unacceptable to the Chinese Government. I do not think anyone has the right to say that the Chinese Government has ever asked for the first section of this bill, or is satisfied with its other provisions. However, if those provisions remain in the bill when it comes to the final vote, I shall vote for the bill as fittends.

Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware, I think it was, went on substantially to state that the Geary act, so far as the deportation of Chinamen who had been arrested was concerned, could not be enforced for want of funds. He said it would cost some six or seven million dollars to deport from the United States all the Chinese unlawfully here. The Senator knows that a Chinese laborer can not be deported until after a decision by a court that he be deported; that it would be impossible to deport all the Chinese in one year or two years or three years. It is impossible that all the cases be heard in that time.

When the Government undertakes a great work of public importance, which is to cost six or seven million dollars, Congress does not appropriate the whole amount at one time, but it appropriates it in small sums. It would be just as reasonable to say that the work should not be commenced because it is to cost $6,000,000, and only $100,000 is appropriated, as it would be to say that the work of deporting the Chinese unlawfully in this country should not be commenced because the whole amount ary to deport all the Chinese in this country has not been provided.

I know that immediately after the expiration of the time allowed by the Geary act for registration, circulars were sent out by the Attorney-General to district attorneys and instructions re sent to officers of the Government not to enforce the provisions of the Geary act providing for deportation, a lack of funds being given as an excuse, but the judge of the southern district of California, in a case tried before him, after the instructions to the district attorney were read in his court, said that the Attorney-General could not say that the money appropriated to execute the Chinese exclusion act was to be used for this or that particular purpose; that as long as there was any portion of the appropriation unexpended it could be applied for the deportation of Chinese. I think the action of the Department of Justice in this matter, and probably the action of the Department of the Treasury, is justly subject to criticism. I think they had proceeded to enforce the law to the extent possible with the money which had been appropriated for the purpose of executing it. If the money appropriated had been applied to that purpose, long ago the Chinese Government would have come formally to this Government and asked for an extension of time, so that her subjects might be relieved from the consequences of a violation of the provisions of the Geary act.

int

Mr. STEWART. The Senator is very familiar with the subject, and is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. wish to ask him if we have any assurances that our Government will execute the law, or that the Treasury Department will ex-ecute the law, if we pass it? Have there been any assurances of that kind? Mr. DOLPH. I think the Senator from Nevada is better informed in regard to what the Administration and the various Departments of the Government will do, or may be supposed to than I am; and I think I shall not answer that question.

Mr. STEWART. I did not know but that the Senator had some assurances for the future that the Department would respect the law. They have not had any respect for the law in

Mr. DOLPH. The matter stands in this way: Congress, by an act approved May 5, 1892, required that all Chinese laborers in this country entitled to be here should within a year apply for and obtain a certificate as evidence of their right to remain but a very few, I think only about 13,000 Chinese laborers out of something like 100,000 in this country, applied for certificates, not because they were not willing to apply, but because certain organizations in this country, which controlled the actions of Chinese laborers, refused to permit them to register. excuse is that they were advised by eminent lawyers in this country that the act was unconstitutional, but every man who institutes or defends a law suit is advised by eminent counsel in regard to the merits of his case, and if he goes into court and is unsuccessful, he must abide by the judgment and the decision of the court, and he has no remedy.

By the direction of the Chinese Six Companies the Chinamen did not register; they defied the United States, and defied the law; they allowed the time to expire, and they are subject now to de-portation for violation of the law. The Administration has made no determined effort to enforce the law, so far as it requires the deportation of Chinese laborers, but it has substantially come to Congress and asked for legislation to relieve the Chinese laborers from the effect of the violation of the law, and not only to relieve them from that, but to suspend all proceedings which have been taken or which are being had for the deportation of

As I said, if China had relieved this Government from the necessity of backing squarely down from the enforcement of its own laws, I should have had no objection to an extension of time for registration. Even now I have concluded to leave the question as to the attitude this Government shall take in regard to this mat-to the attitude this Government shall take in regard to this matter to the Administration, and shall vote for the bill.

The junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] has found what he thinks is a great injustice to the Chinese people in the provision of the first section, that in case a Chinese laborer refuses during the period of six months allowed by this act to register he shall be taken before a United States judge and shall be deported unless he shall establish to the satisfaction said judge that by reason of accident, sickness, or other unavoidable cause he has been unable to procure his certificate, and to the satisfaction of said United States judge, and by at least one credible witness other than Chinese, that he was a resident of the United States on the 5th of May, 1892.

It will be observed that this testimony of a witness other than a Chinese witness is not required when a Chinese laborer applies for registration within six months; it is not a matter affecting his excuse for not registering; the proof required is merely to the fact that he was in this country at the time the Geary bill became a law. He may prove everything else and he may excuse his failure to register by Chinese witnesses. That might be a matter about which he might not be able to get white testimony; but certainly the fact that he was here at a certain date he ought to be able to prove by other than Chinese witnesses. know enough about Chinese testimony to say that if he was not required to prove the fact by other than Chinese testimony there would be no use of requiring proof at all, because you can prove any fact you choose by Chinese testimony, and that my friend from California [Mr. White] knows as well as I do.

Some question was made by the Senstor from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] as to whether this act would relieve those Chinese laborers who had already been arrested and ordered deported under the Geary act. It will be seen by reference to page 3 of the printed bill that it is provided—cedings for a violation of the provisions of said section 6 of said act of May 5, 1892, as originally enacted, shall hereafter be instituted, and that all proceedings for said violation now pending are hereby discon-

I have no doubt that the deportation of Chinese already ordered deported by the act would be considered as part of the proceedings instituted under the act of May 5, 1892, and that therefore such Chinese would be set at liberty if this bill should pass.

The Senator from Illinois also found some fault with the latter part of the clause at the bottom of page 4, which requires the marshal of the district, in which the order of deportation is made, to execute the same, and provides that-

Pending the execution of such order such Chinese person shall remain in the custody of the United States marshal, and shall not be admitted to ball.

I do not think a writ of habeas corpus could be issued upon the application of a Chinaman who has been ordered deported. a rule, the writ of habeas corpus is not issued to review the final judgment of a court of justice having jurisdiction of the party and the subject-matter, and there can be no question about the court that is given jurisdiction of this proceeding, and there would appear to be no question about the jurisdiction over a party arrested and brought before it. I can not conceive that a writ of habeas corpus would be allowed by any court to reverse or to inquire into the validity of such a judgment. The reason why I presume this provision has been inserted is the reason stated by the junior Senator from California [Mr. Perkins] a

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, it is a question of identity.

Mr. DOLPH. There can be no question of identity, I think. if the Chinaman is not allowed to get out of the custody of the United States marshal. The court would have jurisdiction of the Chinaman arrested, and I suppose would have to determine whether he was entitled to remain, and I do not see how the question of identity could arise.

I wish to repeat what I said before in regard to these provisions. If we are going to give this additional time for registration, going to do this act of—well, you may call it justice to the Chinese Government, if it is considered such—or this act of grace. then I should have preferred that we should stand upon the Geary law and if we refused to modify that, simply give time for registration.

If these other provisions are to remain in the bill, I believe they could have been improved. I doubt very much whether they will not increase the difficulties which will arise in the enforcement of our laws for the restriction of Chinese immigra-I know the Senator from California says-and I agree with him in that matter-that the first clause of section 2 is unwise as now drawn; that the matter of interpreting the word "Inborer" or 'laborers" should not have been undertaken, but should have been left to the courts, or we should have stopped with the provision that this act should apply to both skilled and unskilled manual laborers, and not have undertaken to provide that Chinese employed in certain industries should be considered Chinese laborers; and that even now that the bill should be amended by striking out that latter clause providing that the term "Chinese laborer" should-be construed to mean both skilled and unskilled manual laborers, including Chinese employed in mining, fishing, huckstering, peddling, laundrymen, or those engaged in taking, drying, or otherwise preserving shell or other fish for home consumption or exportation.

Or that we should insert "agriculture and horticulture," and perhaps "lumbering," and some other industries.

Mr. HOAR. I rose with a view of calling the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the very point which he is discussing, and perhaps he will allow me to ask him what he understands by the term "manual laborers" as used in this bill, and whether that term, as commonly used, includes laborers in factories—that is, those whose chief function is attending machinery or operating by means of machinery. Is that "manual labor" within the meaning of the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. I think it is, and I understand that the courts of California have decided that this word "laborer" or the word "laborers," as used in the existing law, includes every one but the excepted classes of Chinese who are entitled to come to this country; that it includes members of the highbinders' organiza-

Mr. HOAR. If I understand correctly the word is not "manual

Mr. HOAR. Illumersuand correctly the word is not "manual laborers" in the old law, but "laborers."

Mr. DOLPH. I do not remember. I can refer to it directly.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator if this is not a very narrow restriction of law? I should object to it on that account.

Is it proposed to confine it now to what is to be held by the judges to be included within the term "manual laborer"? question I wish to raise, about which I have not expressed an opinion, is whether the phrase "manual laborer" as used in this legislation includes men whose main function is working by machinery. I do not think that the skilled laborers of Worcester, in my State, employed in machine shops, working on shoes, or attending looms or spinning machines, would be called "manual laborers

Mr. SQUIRE. They are called operatives.
Mr. HOAR. I do think the phrase "manual labor" applies to where the chief mechanism is the human hand itself.

Mr. SQUIRE. That is the literal meaning. Mr. HOAR. This bill may have some other objections. It seems to me, at any rate, that the gentlemen who propose to pass a law, and pass it with a full warning that if the courts anywhere in this country say you have so amended the law that it does not apply to a tenth part of the persons the old law did, are taking something of a risk.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not going to defend the provisions of section 2. I have already given my views in regard to both sec-tion 1 and section 2. Early in the session I introduced a bill to appropriate $500,000, which I thought would be ample and more than enough to execute this law to the 30th of next June. I found I could not procure the report of that bill from the Committee on Foreign Relations with any recommendation, but it was reported without recommendation and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and I have no idea, from what I understand to be the temper of Congress, that Congress is disposed to appropriate a large amount of money to carry out the existing law. I should much prefer that China had requested some action on the part of this Government before we proceed to legislate, and should prefer, if we are to extend the time, that it be done without these other provisions to which objection can be taken, and which I think ought to be put in better shape if they are to be enacted into law.

I recognize the fact that we are not likely to have a vigorous enforcement of the existing law; and as I can not get a bill to suit me entirely I shall vote for the pending measure, even if it is not amended in the Senate.

amended?

Mr. GRAY. How would the Senator suggest that it be nended? Will he propose some amendment? Mr. DOLPH. The Senator knows that I proposed an amendment in the Committee on Foreign Relations, where I proposed to strike out all but the first section.

Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator offer that as an amendment?
Mr. DOLPH. No; I do not offer it. The Senator from Delaware has reported the bill, I presume, after securing a majority of the committee in favor of the report, and I am not going to antagonize the committee or antagonize the majority in the Senator by the law party by the best to the committee of the securing and the securing the securing and the securing the sec ate; but I am not afraid to say that I believe it would be best to pass the bill simply extending the time for registration, leaving out the other provisions which I consider very crude, as they stund; but I understand the request of the Department is that this bill be passed without being amended in order to secure its enactment at this session, by preventing the necessity of its further consideration in the House.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to address the Senate at this time, except to call the attention of the Senator from Oregon and of the committee to the proposition of the Senator from Delaware and of the Senator from California.

We have, unless I err in my recollection—and the Senator from Oregon does not differ with me, so far as I know-a law applying to laborers, and we now come here with a bill amending the term "laborers" so that it shall mean "manual laborers" only. Then the bill goes on to say that it shall include certain enumerated classes, fishermen, etc.

There is, therefore, according to the lawmaking power, a distinction between "laborers" and "manual laborers." This bill if it becomes a law will not include hereafter anybody but manual laborers. Now, it is probably in the power of the generative control of the second statement of the second themen who favor this policy to pass this bill as it stands, without amendment. If they do it, they will not, I am sure, after this warning, when the Administration or the courts hold that they have let out a large number of the persons they seem to desire to reach, come in next year and rebuke and complain of either court or Administration.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill as section 3, the following:

SEC. 3. That the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as shall be required during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the enforcement of the several acts of Congress regulating and prohibiting Chinese immigration.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, I ask the consideration of the amendment which I have submitted, in order to make some remarks referring to the matter at the present time, because the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Dol.PH] has just spoken on that point himself, and has said that he believed it to be the policy of the Administration that there should be no appropriation made in support of the various acts.

Mr. DOLPH. I think the Senator hardly states my remark correctly. I did not mean to say that it was the policy of the Administration that there should be no appropriation. I said in effect that I thought it was doubtful whether we could secure the appropriation, not that the Administration does not want

Mr. SQUIRE. I am very glad that the Senator has modified his statement

Mr. DOLPH. No; I do not modify it. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. SQUIRE. I thought the Senator had made that state-

Mr. DOLPH. If the Senator raises any question of veracity, I shall ask that my remarks be read by the Reporter.

Mr. SQUIRE. I am not raising any question of veracity. I understood the Senator from Oregon to make the statement that it was not practicable to propose an appropriation because, as he understood, it was not the policy of the present Administration to allow a feature of that kind to be incorporated into this bill or to be passed in the present Congress.

Mr. DOLPH. That is so serious a matter that I must be permitted to say that I did not refer to the Administration at all in connection with the appropriation. I said substantially that early in the session I had introduced a bill to appropriate half a million dollars for the purpose of executing the so-called Geary law until the end of the fiscal year, that that bill was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, that I was unable to secure a report from that committee with a recommendation, that the bill was reported back without recommendation and referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that I believed from what I could ascertain that this Congress was not disposed to make an appropriation of a large amount of money for the purpose of executing the law. I spoke about Congress, and not about the Administration at all. I did not mention the Administration in connection with an appropriation.

I said that the Administration certainly asserted through its proper officers that there is not sufficient money to execute that law. I have criticised them, but I have not intimated that the Administration does not intend that Congress shall make an appropriation to enable it to execute the law.

Mr. SQUIRE. It is on this point that I desire to address a few words to the Senate.

At the time of the passage of the last act relating to the exclusion of Chinese, I took occasion to address the Senate at some length in regard to the general question and the necessity for some method of identifying the Chinese under the law. Just prior to that time, or within the previous year, I had been a member of a select committee of the two Houses of Congress, member of a select committee of the two Houses of Congress, which had proceeded to the Pacific coast and taken testimony extensively on that subject, of which testimony I hold a copy in my hand. I am familiar with the subject. The committee took a great deal of pains and was very industrious to inquire into all the facts relating not only to the condition of the Chinese and to the relations between them and the other people of the Pacific coast, but as to what measures ought to be taken to restrict their coming into the United States illegally

It was plainly shown before the committee that they were coming into this country in large numbers over the border from British Columbia into the State of Washington, where there were great facilities existing for their doing so. It was further shown conclusively by the testimony of the United States attorney in San Francisco, and the United States commissioners and by the officers of customs and other officers of the law, that the law had been persistently evaded by the Chinese, and that certificates which were not correct had been substituted for original ertificates; that the original certificates had been handed to certificates; that the original certificates had been hunded to Chinese not entitled to them upon which certificates Chinese entered at the port of San Francisco. Many other facts were brought out. All those interesting questions relating to the Six Companies and their control of the Chinese in this country, the subject of the Highbinders' Association and the various Chinese organizations were fully brought out in the testimony, and that testimony is before Congress. I am not going into that subject extensively to-day; it is not needful that I should

I have been, however, extremely interested in the remarks of the Senator from California [Mr. Perkins]. I indorse all that he has said in relation to the character of the people of the Pacific coast and in relation to the Chinese there, designed to show to the people of the East that the people of the Pacific coast are not unchristian, that they are not unreasonable, that they are simply desirous of protecting their youth, protecting their laborers, and protecting their society. It is not necessary for me to go into the subject generally now.

I propose, however, to draw the attention of the Senate to one point. The great fault of the last legislation enacted by Congress on this subject was that no provision was made for the execution of the law. This has been perfectly evident, as indicated by the decisions of the United States courts. It was supposed, I believe, at the time of the enactment that provision would be made in one of the appropriation bills for the purpose, but the appropriation was not included in the act called the Geary act, and no sufficient subsequent appropriation was made. We have all seen the lack of vigor which the law possessed by reason of there being no appropriation to carry it out. It seems to me it is high time that we address ourselves to that part of the subject, if we are in earnest as a Congress in this policy which the Government of the United States has long since adopted, and which it is consistently pursuing.

adopted, and which it is consistently pursuing.

The votes of the members of the House of Representatives, as I understand, have been unanimous—I do not know that I have I understand, have been unanimous—I do not know that I have a right to refer to that in a parliamentary sense here—but it is well known and widely published, I may say, that there was not a single opposing vote in the House of Representatives, and I might have said, perhaps to-day it is evident, that the sentiment of the people, regardless of party, is in favor of the execution of the Chinese exclusion act, and that a suitable appropriation should be made to inforce it. Then why not show that we mean this in eurnest? Why not make a reasonable appropriation? That will show the people that we have acted in good faith; that will show the Chinese that we mean business. What is the use of this firing in the air all the time? If we do not appropriate the necessary money to carry out the provisions of the act those provisions will be of no account, comparatively speaking.

ing.
Mr. President, I have in my hand two letters from the Secretary tary of the Treasury, which have been addressed by the Secretary to the Vice-President of the United States, in answer to resolu-tions of the Senate. The first of these letters goes on to state— I will only read a part of the letter, as it may not be necessary to read it all-

It will be seen that the balance available on the 7th instant-

That is the 7th of September-for the current fiscal year amounted to $63,502.13. This amount includes the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the last fiscal year, $20,602.33. It is estimated that $38,000 will be required to pay the salaries and necessary expenses of the officers regularly employed to enforce the Chinese exclusion acts for the remainder of the current fiscal year, leaving an estimated balance available for the deportation of Chinese, found to be unlawfully within the United States, of $25,502.13.

Then, the Secretary goes on to make an estimate as to the cost of deporting 10,000 Chinese on the assumption that that number may be disposed of by the courts within the present fiscal year. I am quite willing to have the whole of the letter appear, and perhaps it would be better that it should. I ask that it may be incorporated in my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The communication referred to will be inserted in the RECORD in the absence of objection.

The communication is as follows:

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, and transmitting a statement of the amounts appropriated and expended in the enforcement of the Chinese exclusion acts.

September 12, 1893.—Laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, D. C., September 12, 1893.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,

Washington, D. C., September 12, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of Senate resolution, dated the 7th instant, wherein I am directed to inform the Senate to what extent the appropriations heretofore made for the enforcement of the Chinese exclusion acts have been expended, and what portion of the funds so appropriated are now available, and whether in my opinion it is necessary that a further appropriation be made by Congress in order to carry out the provisions of said acts, and if so, what amount will be required for the current fiscal year.

In reply I inclose herewith a statement showing the amounts appropriated for the purpose above indicated and expended for each year since 1889. It will be seen that the balance available on the 7th instant for the current fiscal year amounted to 483,502.13. This amount includes the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the last fiscal year, 280,692.33. It is estimated that $38,900 will be required to pay the salaries and necessary expenses of the officers regularly employed to enforce the Chinese exclusion acts for the remainder of the current fiscal year, leaving an estimated balance available or the deportation of Chinese found to be unlawfully within the United States in that year was 106,688. Of this number 95,477 were located in the Pacific States and Territories. The number who registered under the act of May 5, 1892, is 13,243, leaving 93,445 who failed to avail themselves of the privileges of saidact. Assuming that about 10 per cent of these would be entitled to exemption as merchants, students, actors, and others of the exempt class, there would remain, say, $5,000 itable to deportation under the law. The lowest cost for transporting Chinamen from San Francisco to Hongkong is $35 per capita. Other expenses incident to the arrest, trial, and linked transportation would average not less than $35 per capita. If, therefore, all of those above referred to who are not registered should be tran would be able to dispose of ten thousand cases during such period the amount required would not be less than $700,000.

Respectfully, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon A. E. Stevenson, Vice-President, United States Senare.

Mr. SQUIRE. In the first letter the amount has been placed at $700,000 required to dispose of 10,000 cases during the period of the present fiscal year, ending June 30 next. I submit the second letter entire, as it is short.

The letter reterred to is as follows:

Letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, giving additional information in regard to the enforcement of the Chinese exclusion act in response to Senate resolution September 7.

October 6, 1894.—Referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, D. C., October 4, 1893.

SIR: Referring to the official communication sent to you on the 12th ultimo in reply to Senate resolution concerning the appropriation for the enforcement of the Chinese exclusion act, I have the honor to inform you that this Department has since been advised that the steamship companies have increased their rates for the transportation of Chinese from San Francisco to Hongkong from $35 per capita to $51 per capita for steerage passage.

There should therefore be added the sum of $16 per capita to the estimated cost of deportation, or $1.380,000, making a total estimated cost of about $7.300,000. Upon a basis of 10,000 to be deported during the current fiscal year the amount required would be $860,000 instead of $700,000, as heretofore stated.

Inclose herewith copy of a letter from the First Auditor, in which he estimates that the expenses are not less than $35 per capita in each case where a Chinese person is arrested and tried under the exclusion acts, now paid from the judiciary appropriation.

This would be in addition to the estimates above given and would increase the grand total to $10,335,000.

Respectfully yours,

C. S. HAMLIN, Acling Secretary.

C. S. HAMLIN, Acting Secretary.

Hon. A. E. STEVENSON, Vice-President of the United States.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE FIRST AUDITOR,
Washington, D. C., September 15, 1893,

Washington, D. C., September 15, 1893.

SIR: Permit me to respectfully call your attention to the fact that in making up the estimates of cost to the United States of enforcing the Chinese exclusion act, no mention is made of that part of the expenditure paid from the regular appropriations for the expenses of the United States courts. It is impossible to make even an approximately accurate estimate of the amount for which the judiciary appropriations will be liable, but from the best information obtainable I am of the opinion that $85 per capita will be a very low estimate for California, while the cost per capita for such chinese persons resident in other States will be much greater than the sum named.

As an example of the maximum of such costs I have before me an account of the United States marshal for the State of Washington, in which his fees in certain deportation cases reach $450 per capita. The consensus of opinion of those who handle such accounts places the cost of arrest and trial at $50 per capita throughout the whole country, including California You will understand that the expenses herein noted all occur before the appropriation for enforcement of the Chinese exclusion act is called upon, and all such expenses are payable from the several judiciary appropriations.

I beg also to call your attention to gection 4 of the exclusion act, and in that connection to state that the estimates hereinbefore made do not include the cost of confinement as provided for in the section referred to.

The cost to the United States of each convict confined in California is cents per day, in Washington $\frac{3}{2}$ per day, and in addition each prisoner receives on his release "a good suit of clothes and $15$ in money." I do not presume to place an interpretation upon section 4 above cited, and only give the cost of confinement in order that you may have the information necessary to an amended estimate should you deem such a course expedient.

E. P. BALDWIN, First Auditor.

Hon, John G. Carlisle, Secretary of the Treasury.

In the second letter there has been an additional calculation based upon the additional cost percapita of deportation; so that the Secretary estimates that the total cost for transporting the same number would be, including the court expenses, which are estimated to be $35 per capita, in all $10,335,000.

Mr. President, the amendment proposed by me is simply that an appropriation be made of $100,000. Of course that amount seems very small in comparison with the amount stated to be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, but it should be said in this connection that no one expects that the Chinese will be deported in wholesale numbers.

It is simply in the exercise of such judgment as Congress may possess that it will apropriate a reasonable amount of money to show good faith, to give notice to the Chinese that they are to be dealt with if they do not register. That is all there is of it. It is just like any other penalty for the commission of a misdemeanor or a crime. As I understand, the Chinese have been dealt with in the State of California for misdemeanor, and for infringing upon the various ordinances of the city of San Francisco; they have been placed in the prisons and in the jails of that city until these places of confinement were crowded, and it became impossible to incarcerate all of those convicted. In that way the Chinese were enabled to set the law at defiance. saw that the ordinary machinery of the law was not sufficient, and that provision could not be made for their incarceration. Therefore, as I understand the matter, provision was made in the act which at present exists, and which it is proposed to amend, for the deportation of the Chinese as a penalty.

Would it not be wise and proper for us to make an appropria-tion? In every year prior to the present there has been an appropriation made. In the year 1889 there was an appropriation of $50,000; in 1890 an appropriation of $30,000; in 1891 an appropriation of $50,000; in 1892 an appropriation of $60,000; in 1893 an appropriation of $100,000, and for the year 1894 an appropriation of $50,000.

Mr. President, I am not proposing to provide a sufficient fund to deport the Chinese in very large numbers. I do not think it is necessary in order to sustain the dignity of the law, but I do think it is necessary to provide a sufficient appropriation to show the intention of the Government. Senators will perhaps remem-ber the old story of Lord Eldon, who for about forty years sat upon the bench, an illustrious chancellor of the court of Great

When a criminal was brought before him charged with stealing a horse which was just above the value of an English shilling, and was asked by the judge what he had to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon him he replied.
"My Lord, it seems very hard that a man should be sentenced to death for stealing a horse of just above the value of ashilling. (The crime of horse-stealing was one of about sixty offenses pun-

(The crime of horse-stealing was one of about sixty offenses punishable at that time by the death penalty.) The memorable answer of Lord Eldon was, "Sir, you are not to be punished because you have stolen a horse of just above the value of a shilling, but that horses may not be stolen."

This involves the whole principle, as I understand it, of the criminal jurisprudence of this and all other lands. The penalty is to be as a deterrent. If the sum of money be provided and the machinery of the law shall go into effect so that these Chinese who fall to register shall be actually deported in examplary. nese who fail to register shall be actually deported in exemplary number, the effect as a deterrent will be immense upon those who have failed to register. I believe many of them will pro-ceed to register in any event. I believe they have been led to see that they erred in judgment in failing to register hereto-fore. But there will be others who will be encouraged by shrewd and able attorneys to resist, unless Congress shall make plain and emphatic the intention of this Government.

We do not know positively what attitude the Six Companies will take on the subject. I believe if a sufficient appropriation be made to show that the Government intends to prosecute these illegal denizens and actually to deport them, then the $\operatorname{Six} \operatorname{Com}$ panies will take notice accordingly and will advise the Chinese residents on the Pacific coast to promptly register.

Therefore it is, Mr. President, that I hope that this sum, the very small sum of $100,000, may be appropriated in this bill; and if it be not deemed best that the amount should reach so large a sum as that, then I think certainly the sum of $50,000 should be appropriated.

I am not speaking unadvisedly on this subject. I have con-ferred with those who have been active in either House of Con-gress upon it, and I believe it is the wish of those who are the best informed on the subject, those members of Congress was reside on the Pacific coast, that there be something effectively done by Congress at this time to show the people of the Pacific coast that the Congress of the United States are in earnest and to show the Chinese that they can not defy the law with im-

Now, Mr. President, I feel confident that my past record upon according to the Chinese their full rights and their full protecaccording to the Chinese their full rights and their full protection under the law will acquit me of any disposition to inflict upon these aliens any injury. It was believed that at the risk of my life, as it was my bounden duty to do, I protected many of them against the attacks of great, angry, turbulent mobs, when these Chinese were attacked in the Territory of Washing. ton, of which I then held the office of governor. After these Chinese had been violently driven out of the city of Tacoma en masse, and after their habitations had been burned, I proceeded, at the request of the honorable Secretary of State, to investigate all the history of this and other attacks upon the Chinese in the Territory of Washington, and to ascertain the damages thereby inflicted upon them. Upon this investigation I had the honor to make a report to the Secretary of State, then Mr. Bayard, and to receive his thanks therefor. I may also state that I sub-sequently received an expression of the thanks of Chinese officials in this country.

I am not now in favor of persecuting these people, or of treating them unfairly.

Althoug; widely different in habits and character from these of our own race, although utterly unassimilative to our blood and instit dons, these children of the Orient are here under the agis of the law. They should be protected while they are here. The provisions of the present law, coupled with those of the proposed enactment, seem to me to be for their benefit and protection, if they would only avail themselves of these benefits

The people of the Pacific coast have had a hard fight upon this question. Their motives have been largely misunderstood and misrepresented among the philanthropic people of the East. The provisions of the proposed enactment are simply to prevent fraud and evasion of the existing law of the United States. I have thought carefully upon the subject, and as I have stated, I have made investigation as chairman of the special committee which was last deputed to inquire into the subje this body, and I see no other way to make the policy of the United States Government effective except by providing for the registration and accurate identification of the Chinese who are entitled under the law to remain in this country.

I believe that all treaties agreed to by this Government arein their nature subordinate to the laws of this country. It stands to reason that no act of the Executive and of the Senate can be superior to a law enacted by both branches of Congress and approved by the Executive. If such a law contravenes a treaty. that treaty must either give way or be relegated to the field of diplomacy for modification into accord with the law of the United States. All nations, or at least all denizens, within our limits are bound to take notice of our laws. It is claimed by some people that our legislation has violated our solemn treaty obligations to China. This I do not admit. But I will not now en-gations to China. This I do not admit. But I will not now en-ter into a discussion of this branch of the subject. Suffice it to say that the attitude of the United States has been already taken. It is simply a question of providing suitable safeguards, and, as I hold, what is still more important, the means to be provided for the execution of the existing law. The policy of this Government has been declared and established Are we to recede from it, or to make it effective by suitable ad-Are we to recede from it, or to make it effective by suitable additional legislation? It seems to me that the dignity of this Government and its attitude on this question require a reasonable appropriation to provide for the execution of the law. This Government has said, "I will;" now let this Government say, "I do," otherwise, we only say, This is what we would do, but we are not able to do it. I am unable to conceive that the present Administration can refuse its assent to the proposed appropriation.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I rise to say merely a word. As I have already said there are some things about the bill that I would have had differently if I could have had my way; but I realize the fact that any amendment to the bill if adopted will defeat it, and no amendment, however wise it might be, can I give my consent to vote for, because I would consider it inimical to the passage of the bill.

As to the matter of an appropriation, it would be well enough perhaps under other circumstances, but I am informed and be-lieve that the present funds at the disposition of the Depart-ment will be quite sufficient to defray any immediate expenses ment will be quite sufficient to deiray any immediate expenses which may be entailed upon the Department if the bill should pass in its present shape; in other words, that there would be a necessity for little or no expenditure of money; and if the bill should not pass $100,000 would be as inadequate as 100 cents; it would take six or seven million dollars. I hope that no amendment will be put upon the bill, however plausible or however wise it may seem, because it means hostility to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE].

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I simply desire to say, because I do not want to occupy the time of the Senate at all, that as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I was not in favor and I am not now in favor of the pending bill. I believe that the Geary law as it passed Congress was a violation of all of our treaty obligations; that it dishonored the nation. I believe, morally, the law was a crime, and commercially, I know it was a blunder. I have no friendship for the bill or for any bill of a like kind.

Mr. SQUIRE. I ask the Senator from Delaware to explain a little more in detail why he thinks a vote for the pending amendment would be a vote against the bill.

Mr. GRAY. Because I believe it impossible in the remaining hours of this session (as it is believed that the present ses sion will be numbered by hours) to adopt any amendment that might be passed in the other branch of Congress. Mr. FRYE. It would have to go to the Committee of the Whole in the other House.

Mr. GRAY. Therefore I believe, and I have so expressed myself, that the only thing to relieve the present situation is to pass the bill without amendment. Unless there is some Senator Therefore I believe, and I have so expressed on either side who wishes to address the Senate on the bill, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business at this time, and let the matter go over until to-

Mr. WHITE of California. I will state to the Senator from Delaware taat I have been informed there are two or three Senators who desire to address the Senate on the subject, and I my-Bell desire to do so, more for the purpose of answering questions than for anything else. However, there are two or three Senathan for anything else. However, there are two or three Senators I think who desire to address the Senate.

Mr. GRAY. If there are no other Senators who desire to speak this evening, I wish to say that it is exceedingly important, in my opinion and in the opinion of those who agree with me about the bill, that we should have a vote upon it at as early a day as practicable; and I ask the Senate to agree to vote on the bill to-morrow at 4 o'clock, unless the debate should cease before that time.

Mr. BOLPH (to Mr. GRAY). See if you can not obtain unanimous consent.

Mr. GRAY.

I ask unanimous consent, of course.

Mr. DAVIS rose.
Mr. GRAY. There is a great desire, as Senators well know, to adjourn after the exhaustive labors of the present session. and it seems to me that all that need be said on either side of the question can be said to-morrow by the time I have named. I make the appeal in the interest of the public service that we shall reach a vote to-morrow before we adjourn. If any hour later than 4 o'clock will suit Senators, of course that hour can be fixed. I ask unanimous consent that we shall take the vote upon the bill to-morrow at 4 o'clock, unless some later hour to-morrow

of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. DAVIS. I have no impedient to offer to the speedy disposition of the bill. I desire to address the Senate briefly upon position of the bill. I desire to address the Senate briefly upon it. I can not do it to-day, for I wish to obtain some data, and I do not want to be cut out by any arbitrary fixing of the hour to-morrow when the vote shall be taken. How many Senators desire to speak upon the bill I do not know. I understand the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] designs to speak in reply to any objections which may be offered to the passage of the bill, and I hoped to have the pleasure of hearing him before I submitted any remarks of my own, for I sincerely desire to be enlightened upon the subject.

lightened upon the subject.

Mr. GRAY. I will merely say there is a hope expressed on all sides over here that we may be able to adjourn the day after to-morrow. I should be one of the last to wish to debar the Senator from Minnesota from saying all that he wishes to say.

In fact I would wish to hear all he might desire to say upon this bill as I would desire to hear him upon any other measure; and if a later hour to-morrow would be more agreeable, we might fix, say, 6 o'clock, unless debate ceases before that time. I will extend the time indicated in the request, and ask the Senate to agree that a vote shall be taken on the bill at 6 o'clock to-morrow unless the debate ceases before that hour.

Mr. CALL. I am not at all disposed to delay the bill; but I wish to submit a few brief observations upon it, and with that understanding I shall have no objection to the arrangement suggested.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HOAR. I think it quite probable, indeed almost certain, that the debate will be over long before the time the Senator from Delaware suggests, but I would rather not give my consent now to bind the Senate. I do not believe there will be any trouble about reaching a vote tomorrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Delaware.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

I move that the Senate proceed to the consider-Mr. GRAY.

ation of executive business

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 8 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, November 2, 1893, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 1, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. E. B. BAGBY, of Washington, D. C.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION OF CHAPLAIN.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration. The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Edward B. Bagby, of the City of Washington, D. C., be, and he is hereby elected Chaplain of the Fifty-third Congress, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Samuel W. Haddaway.

The resolution was adopted. On motion of Mr. HOLMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

The Rev. Mr. Bagby then appeared at the bar of the House and was sworn into office by the Speaker.

DEFICIENCIES IN. APPROPRIATIONS FOR EXPENSES OF LAND OFFICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of deficiencies in the appropriations for the expenses of the Land Office for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ENTRIES UNDER THE DESERT-LAND ACT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House an act (S. 592) to extend the time for making final payment on entries under the desertland act; which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (H. R. 2799) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of United States circuit and district courts in South Dakota, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I had some conversation with one of the gentlemen representing South Dakota [Mr. Lucas], and I understood that he desired concurrence in the Senate amendments to this bill; but this morning I have received a telegram from Mr. Pickler, the author of the bill, expressing a desire that it be postponed until he can look into the I therefore ask that the bill lie on the Speaker's table subject. for the present.

The SPEAKER. Without objection this bill will lie on the Speaker's table until the return of the gentleman from South Dakota | Mr. PICKLER

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

NEW YORK AND NEW JERSEY BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 3289) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Hudson River be-tween New York City and the State of New Jersey, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House disagree with the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The amendments will be read.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows.

Page 1, line 17, strike out "lay upon" and insert "locate, construct, and intain." Page I, line 18, after "bridge," insert "and the approaches thereto." Page I, line 19, strike out all after "road" down to and including "thereto,"

Page 2, line 1, strike out "their" and insert "its."
Page 2, line 2, strike out "tracks" and insert "and."
Page 2, line 2, and 3, strike out "and connections."
Page 2, line 8, strike out all after "the" down to and including "pre-reflect." Page 2, line 11, insert "Secretary of War."

Page 2, line 15, strike out all after "New York" down to and including
"New York." in line 27.
Page 4, line 3, strike out "and" where it first occurs and insert "or."
Page 5, line 7, strike out all after "reserved" down to and including "same." line 12, and insert: "And the provisions of subdivision 3 of this act shall be extended to any other bridge company heretofore authorized by Congress to bridge said river at New York City: Provided. That such company shall submit plans and location of its bridge pursuant thereto to the Secretary of War within one year after the passage of this act.

The motion of Mr. DUNPHY that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate and ask a committee of conference was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. GEARY, Mr. BARTLETT, and Mr. FLETCHER.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution [S. R. 36] transferring the exhibit of the Navy Department, known as the model battle ship Illinois, to the State of Illinois, as a naval armory for the use of the naval militia of the State of Illinois, on the termination of the World's Columbian Exposition; when the Speaker signed the same.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 1) to repeal a part of an act, approved July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," with amendment of the Senate thereto.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That so much of the act approved July 14, 1890, entitled 'An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes,' as directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase from time to time silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases Treasury notes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed. And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals, and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such a safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts."

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the amendment of the Senate to the House bill which has just been read, and on that I demand the previous question. I wish to say, however, to my friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] upon the other side that I have no desire to press for a vote immediately after the lapse of the half hour which will be allowed under the rules for debate if the previous question is ordered. If the previous question can, therefore, be considered as ordered, I am perfectly willing that the half hour allowable under the rules may be extended to such reasonable time to-day as the gen-tleman may desire for debate upon the question—say three tleman may desire for depate upon the question—say three o'clock or half-past three.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am personally concerned I have no desire to unduly delay the consideration of this bill and the final vote upon it.

I had hoped, however, that the friends of the measure would permit it to come up in its regular order for debate in the regular way. The gentleman in charge of the bill has a majority with him. Under the rules of the House he can move the prewith him. Under the rules of the House he can move the previous question at any time, and I do not see the necessity on this occasion for demanding the previous question and afterward to have the debate.

It seems to me we could let the debate go on, and when the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] thinks and the House thinks that debate has proceeded far enough, the gentleman can then demand the previous question. I hope the bill will remain open for debate at least until that time.

Mr. ALLEN. As I understand, the proposition of the gentleman from West Virginia is to only partially stifle debate by the previous question.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Allen] will take the House into his confidence.

Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] will take the House into his confidence. We can not hear him.

Mr. BLAND. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], who is in charge of the bill, will permit the debate to go on until he sees proper to move the previous question.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The parliamentary difficulty in the way of that, Mr. Speaker, is that if I call up the bill on a motion to concur, without demanding the previous question. I lose control of the bill upon the floor of the House, and the debate goes on with opportunities for all sorts of amendments. Therefore I feel constrained to insist upon my motion for the previous question.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois and others. That is right.
Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has control of the bill—

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I would say to gentlemen on the other side that I am perfectly willing to extend the half hour allowable for debate under the rule, after the previous question is ordered, to one hour, two hours, or three hours, if gentlemen desire that time for debate.

Mr. BLAND. In reply to the gentleman's suggestion that he will lose control of the bill, I will say that he will not lose control of the bill unless the House takes it away from him.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill a question?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. In a moment. I do not the remark of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] I do not hear the remark of the gentleman from Missowri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. I say the gentleman will not lose control of the bill unless the House takes it away from him.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if he will consent to this: To consider the previous question as ordered and allow five-minute speeches until 4 o'clock this afternoon, simply for the purpose of allowing members to give reasons for their votes, and to give opportunity for such amendments as may be offered, and at 4 o'clock let the voting begin and be closed before the House adjourn?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginis. I have made the only motion that it seems to me I can properly make, that is, the demand for the previous question with the offer to extend the half hour to an hour, or two hours, or even three hours, if gentlemen mand for the previous question with the offer to extend the half hour to an hour, or two hours, or even three hours, if gentlemen upon the other side desire that time for debate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not desire that the gentleman shall lose control of the bill. My proposition is that the previous question be considered as ordered, and the voting begin promptly at 4 o'clock upon all amendments, and finally upon the substitute as adopted by the Senate, allowing members five minutes each.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. There is no amendment, except the amendment offered by the Senate.
Mr. LIVINGSTON. There may be.
Mr. STOCKDALE. I wish to make an inquiry at this stage of the proceedings.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman state it.
Mr. HUDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.
The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE] rises to a parliamentary inquiry.
Mr. STOCKDALE. I would like to ascertain, if possible, why

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. So many gentlemen are speaking to me that I can not hear the questions that are being put to me Mr. STOCKDALE. Then I will suggest, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. STOCKDALE. Then I will suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we seem to be in the hands of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], and whatever is granted to us is by his leave, if we can not make an inquiry.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I made no objection to the inquiry. I simply said I could not hear the gentleman.

Mr. STOCKDALE. The gentleman will pardon me, I thought he declined. My inquiry is, why is it that this bill is to take a different course from any other bill?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois It is not

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It is not.
Mr. STOCKDALE. Why is it that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Wilson] says he can only consent to move the previous question now, and then to extend the priviledge to members to speak who wish to be heard, cutting off all amendments? Is the bill so defective that it can not bear scrutiny, and that amendments can not be offered? Are there no rights belonging to gentlemen in this House except those who favor this bill? Or are we to look to any gentleman on this floor for the privilege of exercising the rights of American Representatives

Mr. REED. The one-man power. [Laughter.]

Mr. STOCKDALE. The one-man power that has "come down to us from a former generation."

Not the one-man power that is now in operation. Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order, Mr. Speaker. It is utterly impossible, owing to the confusion, to hear what is proceeding upon the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will endeavor to maintain order on the floor if gentlemen will keep their seats.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to say to the gentleman from West Virginia, in charge of this bill, that the friends of silver do not intend to obstruct the passage of the bill—
Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia to be in the line of expediting a vote on the bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Undoubtedly. We are just as anxious, some of us who have been here all the time, although the gentleman from Missouri has been gone five or six weeks in the short session—we are just as anxious to get away from here and go home as anybody else. We only want to have an opportunity to explain our votes upon this proposition, to put the matter before the country in proper shape, to endeavor if possible to secure harmonious action amongst the Democrats, and at the same time give the silver men every opportunity to be heard on this matter. Now, I appeal to the gentleman to give this time that I have requested up to 4 o'clock, and then let the voting begin.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I have made the proposition of the gentlem in from Georgia to the other side.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then if the gentleman in charge of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures will not accept the proposition I will accept it. [Laughter.] Mr. BRYAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from West Vir-ginia a question. Do we understand that the reason for moving the previous question is to prevent the House from having the right to vote on amendments if desired?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. That is one reason; but—

Mr. BRYAN. I want the RECORD to show that those in charge of this bill are not willing that those who are opposed to it shall have the right to express themselves on amendments to be offered.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The opportunity was given and we voted on all of the amendments offered from that side, as the gentleman is well aware.

Mr. BRYAN. Let me ask the gentleman if that has not been about three months ago?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand the chairman of the committee agreed that amendments should be offered and debated up to 4 o'clock. [Cries of "Oh, no."]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I made no agreement about amendments.

Mr. LIVINGTSON. Whether the gentleman from Missouri can speak for his side of the question or not I think that the proposition submitted is not an unreasonable one.

proposition submitted is not an unreasonable one.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman from Georgia kindly state which side he is on?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland], speaking for his side if he can do so, state whether or not he will accept my proposition?

Mr. BLAND. I can accept no proposition except that this bill shall be acted upon in the regular way.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Then, Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to insist on my motion for the previous question.

obliged to insist on my motion for the previous question.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia demands the previous question on his motion.

Mr. BRYAN. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were-ayes 126, noes 180,

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I move that the House take a recess until 3 o'clock.

The question was taken; and on a division there were-ayes 21, noes 191.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Friday at 12 o'clock.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to prevail.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and mays were refused.

Mr. BRYAN. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays. Tellers were refused.
Mr. BRYAN. I ask for a count of the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side. The rules provide that one-fifth of a quorum may order tellers, so as to that question there is no other side.

So the motion was rejected. Mr. BRYAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division there were-ayes 23, noes 185,

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House

Mr. SPODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourns it be to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. SPRINGER. That motion has just been rejected; to-morrow is Thursday, and the House has just refused to adjourn. Mr. SNODGRASS. I move that it adjourn until Thursday at II o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order on that motion that it is a recess. The rules of the House provide that when the House adjourns it be to meet at 12 o'clock, and the fixing of a time prior to that is simply in the nature of a recess. We can not change the time of adjournment by a motion. When we adjourn we adjourn to a time fixed in the rule, and to adjourn to any other time must, in the nature of things, be a recess.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It is a motion to change the rules of the House in that regard.

Mr. OOKERY. The effect of the motion would be to change the standing order of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to the fact that this would be in effect a change of the order of the House.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Then I modify my motion and move to take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock. The SPEAKER (having put the question on the motion of Mr.

SNODGRASS). The noes seem to have it.
Mr. SNODGRASS. I ask for a division.
The question being taken, there were—ayes 10, noes 181.
Mr. SNODGRASS. I call for the yeas and nays on this ques-

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were-ayes 29.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I call for the other side.

The negative vote being called for on ordering the yeas and nays, the result was announced—ayes 29, noes 185, not one-fifth voting in the affirmative.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays. Tellers were not ordered, only 20 voting therefor.

So the yeas and nays were refused; and the motion of Mr. SNODGRASS was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that when we adjourns it be to meet on Saturday next. Mr. WELLS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLS. Have not the Committee on Rules got a readymade rule that will operate in this case? [Laughter.] If so, why is it not presented?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Nebraska moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BRYAN, there ere—ayes 24, noes 196. Mr. BRYAN. I ask for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 25 voting in favor thereof.

So the motion of Mr. BRYAN was rejected. Mr. SNODGRASS. I move that the House adjourn. Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] rise?
Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. To make a motion. I move that the House take a recess for thirty minutes, in order that the five "czars" constituting the Committee on Rules may bring in a cloture rule to put an end to this time-dishonored foolishness.

[Laughter and applause.]
The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to put the motion. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS] moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRYAN. I move to amend by fixing the time to which the House shall adjourn as Friday noon.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn is not amendable.

Mr. BRYAN. Then I move to adjourn till Friday noon.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House adjourn the gentleman from Nebraska moves that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I move that the House take a recess until Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Bryan] takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS]. The question will be first taken on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BRYAN, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday mext, there were—ayes 24, noes 180.

Mr. BRYAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 21 voting in favor

So the motion of Mr. BRYAN was rejected.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I move to take a recess for one hour.

The SPEAKER. There is pending a motion of the gentleman from Tennesses [Mr. SNODGRASS] to adjourn, which takes precedence of the motion for a recess.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I withdraw the motion to adjourn, and move to take a recess for one hour.

Mr. BRYAN. Pending that I move that we do now adjourn. Mr. SNODGRASS. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn until Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the position of the question—The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House take a recess for one hour; the gentleman from Nebraska moves that the House do now adjourn. The question will be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question having been put,
The SPEAKER. The noes seem to have it.
Mr. BRYAN. I call for a division.
The question being again taken, there were—ayes 21, noes 178.
Mr. BRYAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The question having been taken on ordering the yeas and nays,

The SPEAKER. Twenty-five gentlemen have risen in favor of ordering the yeas and nays—in the opinion of the Chair, not a sufficient number.

Mr. BRYAN. I demand tellers.

The question was taken on ordering tellers.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-one gentlemen have arisen in support of the demand—not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The noes have it, and the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a respectful metion.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending. What is the

Mr. MORSE. I desire to move, Mr. Speaker, that the House take a recess for fifteen minutes to allow the Committee on Rules

The SPEAKER. There is a motion for a recess pending.

Mr. REED. The committee have a perfect right to act

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not suppose the gentleman from Massachusetts to be scrious. [Laughter.]
Mr. REED. I beg pardon; I supposed he was. [Laughter.]
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House take a recess for one hour.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seem to have it.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 22, noes 167.
Mr. SNODGRASS. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.
The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Sixteen gentlemen have arisen-not a sufficient number

Mr. SNODGRASS. I call for the other side.

The other side was counted.

The other side was counted.
The SPEAKER. Sixteen gentlemen have arisen to second the demand, and 165 have arisen in opposition—not one-fifth, and the yeas and nays are refused.
Mr. SNODGRASS. I demand tellers.
The question was taken on ordering tellers.
The SPEAKER. Ten gentlemen have arisen in support of the demand for tellers—not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The noes have it, and the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is not agreed to from Tennessee is not agreed to.

Mr. BRYAN. I move that the House do now adjourn. The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. Division. The House divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 164.

Mr. BRYAN. I demand the yeas and nays.
Mr. BRYAN. I demand the yeas and nays.
Mr. WILSON of Washington. A parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. WILSON of Washington. The proposition I desire to submit possibly may interest the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]. Do I understand, and does this side of the House understand, because when this bill or what was known as the Wilson bill was up before all the amendments that were offered came from the other side of the House, that if the previous question is ordered it will be in order to offer any amendments to this bill; and, if so, will this side have any opportunity to offer any amendments?

The SPEAKER. If the previous question is ordered the matter is not amendable.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. It will not be amendable then; and if the previous question is ordered no amendments will be entertained?

The SPEAKER. Not after the previous question has been dered. The gentleman from Nebraska demands the year and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-two gentlemen have arisen in support of the demand for the yeas and nays-not a sufficient num-

Mr. DUNN. If I understand the rules, those making a demand for the yeas and nays must show by one-fifth of a quorum that they have a right to that motion.

The SPEAKER. One-fifth of those present may have the yeas and nays ordered. One-fifth of a quorum may order tellers, but one-fifth of those present, under the Constitution of the United States, may have the yeas and nays.

Mr. DUNN. Is it not their duty to show that they have the right to that privilege without compelling the other side to

The SPEAKER. One-fifth of those present, under the Constitution, may have the year and mays put upon the Journal. Twenty-two gentlemen have arisen to second the demand for the yeas and nays and 145 have arisen in opposition-not one-fifth have seconded the demand, and the yeas and mays are refused. The noes have it, and the House refuses to adjourn. Mr. BRYAN. I ask for tellers on the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands tellers. He has the right to make that demand. The question was taken.
The SPEAKER. Nineteen gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused. The noes have it, and the House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I move that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

Mr. SHAW. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHAW. It is evident that a number of gentlemen on the ficor of this House have made engagements elsewhere this after-noon, and I would like to inquire if it will be in order to grant indefinite leave of absence to all who desire to retire from this

Mr. SPEAKER. That would not be in order.
Mr. SHAW. I thought not.
Mr. BRYAN. I move the House do now adjourn.
Mr. TRACEY. I submit that that motion is out of order.

That was the last motion submitted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Nebraska to the fact that the motion to adjourn is of higher privilege than the motion to take a recess, and the House has just voted down a motion to adjourn. The vote would first have to be taken on the motion to adjourn, which would be a repetition of the motion without intervening business.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I move to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. The last vote was taken on the motion to adjourn. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has a motion pending, which is in order; but the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska is out of order.

Mr. BRYAN. In order to obviate that difficulty, Mr. Speaker. I move that when we adjourn to-day it be to meet on Friday at 12 o'elock

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska by striking out Saturday and substituting Friday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] to be that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Then I move to strike out Friday and insert Thursday.

The SPEAKER. The House would meet to-morrow under the

The SPEARER. The House would meet to-morrow under the rule without any such order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on my motion.

The question being taken on Mr. BRYAN's motion, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next, the Speaker declared that the nose seemed to have it.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask for a division.

The house divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 157.

Mr. BRYAN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, 18 members voted in the affirmative; not a sufficient number.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask for the other side.

The other side was counted, and 146 members voted in the negative. Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers on the demand for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, 13 members voted in the affirmative; not a sufficient number; so tellers were refused.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS], that the House take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 1, noes 180.

The question being taken on ordering tellers, they were refused, only 17 members voting in the affirmative.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise now to a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the previous question is ordered by the House will not a motion to commit the bill with instructions let in an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that a mo-tion to commit with instructions would be in order after the previous question is ordered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I want to say to the gentlemen who are fighting this proposition in this way that they can get in their amendments after the previous question is ordered upon a motion to commit with instructions.

Mr. SNODGRASS. If this bill is to be forced through in the interest of the plutcoryst and hankers of Well street, we do not interest of the plutocrats and bankers of Wall street, we do not intend to lie down and consent to it.

The SPEAKER (having put the question on ordering the previous question). The previous question is ordered. [Applause.] There will now be fifteen minutes for debate on each side. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] to control the fifteen minutes in favor of the proposition, and will afterward recognize the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Prevent to serve the gent BLAND] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. SNODGRASS. I rise to make a motion to adjourn.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] had been recognized.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that, the gentleman from West Virginia being on the floor, the gentleman from Tennessee can not make a motion until he yields.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Then I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it. Mr. SNODGRASS. I want to know whether, notwithstanding the ordering of the previous question, we shall not still have the right to make these motions; and if so, what advantage have the gentlemen gained?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair thinks. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland] desires to occupy his fifteen minutes, I hope he will do so now. I reserve my time.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Market North and the form man from West Virginia had not the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had announced that he recognized the gentleman from West Virginia for fifteen minutes and would subsequently recognize the gentleman from Missouri for fifteen minutes. That was the announcement of the Chair. Under the rules, after the previous question is ordered, thirty minder the rules. utes are allowed for debate-fifteen minutes on each side of the proposition.

Mr. BRYAN. Has any one the floor at this time for speaking?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] has the floor.

Mr. BRYAN. I thought he reserved his time.

The SPEAKER. If he does, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have read at the Clerk's desk an amendment that I expect to offer to this bill. At the proper time I shall move to recommit this bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures with instructions to report it back with this amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the Senate amendment the following: "And to provide for carrying into effect the policy of the foregoing declara-tion and that so much of the act of January 18, 1837, in regard to the estab-lishment of a mint and relating to the coins of the United States as relates to and provides for the coinage of the standard silver dollar of 412 grains of standard silver, be, and the same is hereby, revived and remacted into full force and effect."

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, we have now reached the time when a vote must be taken on the all-important question of returning to the Sherman law of 1873—a pitiable condition I must confess, as a Democrat on this floor; for since that law was partially repealed in 1878 I have witnessed in this House struggle after struggle wherein the Democratic party stood almost solid in favor of the unlimited coinage of silver. But in an evil hour the moneyed interests of this country, as I believe for the purpose of affecting legislation, have precipitated what probably might have been troubles early in the future, have encouraged and brought on in this country a panic, and have insisted that it was the silver-purchasing clause of the Sherman law of 1890

And now, Mr. Speaker, this law is to be wiped from the statute book. It is a law with which I have no particular sympathy. I had hoped that it might not be wiped off until that great politically in the statute book. cal party to which I belong may have performed its pledges in this Houseand restored silver to unlimited coinage. I had hoped that the existing law might have for the time assisted in sustaining the value of silver until we could have fully restored it to free coinage.

If the proposition were that which has been proclaimed on the floor of this House from time to time during the last fifteen years-that if we are to coin silver we should put more silver in a dollar and thus make it nearer the commercial ratio, that would be a reasonable proposition. We made concessions upon that point for the purpose of testing the sincerity of those who made such statements, and we found them utterly false.

I shall offer this amendment, Mr. Speaker, as the platform on which the Democratic party of the South and West will do battle in the future. It contemplates the repeal of the Sherman law of 1873 to follow the repeal of the Sherman law of 1890. It practically repeals the Sherman law of 1873, and places the finances of this country on that broad basis of bimetallism where they stood when that infamous act of 1873 was enacted.

Mr. Speaker, I would have despaired of the future of my party had I not seen in this House and at the other end of the Capitol a stalwart unterrified force that have battled here for the last three months seeking to establish the principles announced in the Democratic platform. But when I see those Representatives the Democratic platform. But when I see those Representatives and those Senators who have stood steadfast in all this storm, I find a nucleus wherein and whereby on the platform announced in the proposed amendment the Democratic party in all sections west of the Allegheny Mountains will stand; and, in my opinion, the great mass of the eastern Democracy will finally stand with them, and we shall triumph on that platform.

We are not discouraged, Mr. Speaker, but, on the contrary, when this law is enacted and placed on the statute books and the whole issue is made up whether this country must go to gold monometallism, that has already practically bankrupted Europe, or whether we shall reëstablish the financial system of the Constitution as given to us by our fathers, I can not doubt the result.

stitution as given to us by our fathers, I can not doubt the result. Bimetallism as of the days before silver was demonetized will yet be decreed by the voters of this country, and that, too, in such way as Representatives will be compelled to obey.

We have been promised, Mr. Speaker, that when this law shall be finally repealed, and we shall have returned to the single gold standard, that the great banking institutions of the country will prove that goid standard, that the great banking institutions of the country will pour out their money, that business will revive, that prosperity will come to this people. Wait and see.

Mr. Speaker, there might possibly be a spasmodic revival of business under these promises, but it can not last. It will be temporary. It can not be permanent. It is impossible that it should be. Because we have seen it tried in Europe—in England and in Germany—and what is the condition of their people at

Mr. SNODGRASS. Stocks are even now falling.

Mr. BLAND. My friend from Tennessee reminds me that stocks have already begun to fall; and if anything should rise on account of the repeal of the Sherman law, and going to a gold standard in this country, it ought to be stocks, for the whole legislation has been thrust into this House and before this Con-legislation has been thrust into this House and before this Congress as a stock-jobbing operation. [Applause.]

They had supposed that by making their bonds and stocks, on which the hose of water has been turned many many times over again in Wall street—that these watered stocks, now depressed and having much of the water wrung out of them, would, when made sure of being paid in gold, rise in value to par, water

But it so happens that the Old World is in distress; and instead of buying our bonds and stocks, they are returning them to us, notwithstanding the repeal of this law. And since we have repealed that law in the interest of stock-gambling and sent down wheat, cotton, and farm products generally, I stand here in the face of these representatives of the great South and West who have stood firm for silver and congratulate them that they have stood steadfast in the interests of their people, and I hope the people will stand steadfast to them in the future. [Ap-

The amendment to be voted upon is submitted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the Senate amendment the following: And to the Senate amendment the following:
"And to provide for carrying into effect the policy of the foregoing declation that so much of the act of January 18, 1837, in regard to the establishment of a mint and relating to the coins of the United States as relates to and provides for the coinage of the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains of standard silver, be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted into full force and effect."

It was the act of January 18, 1837, the Sherman law of 1873 repealed.

We propose to revive and reënact the law of 1837, which was a free-coinage law—a law that authorized and required the unlimited coinage of the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains standard silver. With this act revived the Sherman act of 1873 demonetizing silver will stand repealed. The battle cry from this time forth shall be for the repeal of the Sherman law of

This must be done first of all-no compromises, no discordant notes as to ratios or limitations. Unconditional repeal of the Sherman law is still the battle flag under which we will fight, but this time it is the Sherman law that stopped the coinage of

When we shall have repealed this, the most odious of all the Sherman silver laws, and restored silver where it was before its demonetization in 1873, it will be in order then to talk of ratios. When the decks are cleared and silver is given an equal chance with gold, should any necessity for the changing of the ratio be developed, we can then take counsel whether we should change the silver dollar or the gold dollar, or both, but not till then. Re-peal the Sherman law of 1873 is the platform on which the Democracy of the West and South will lead the people to victory, for the masses of the laboring and producing people of the East are with us in the fight. With this one purpose in view and one thing to be done, there need be no diversions or dissensions on this platform-the people will stand with us

This platform has no uncertain sound, no doubtful constructions, no straddles.

Since the crusade against silver began in this country and Western Europe in 1873, we have witnessed the greatest depression in prices that has occurred in the same period for the last Especially is this so in the fall in prices of agricultucentury. products.

This decline will, in my humble opinion, continue from year to year. Whether the people will patiently bear it is to be seen. If my predictions are unfounded, these prices ought to go up, prosperity ought once again return to our people. The agriculturists have not prospered heretofore, even though we had a partial silver coinage. Nothing but the full restoration of silver will give relief to our money stringency. It is said, however, that now we have returned to gold and gold only, times will be better than ever before. We will wait and see. Ido not believe it. I hope for the best, but fear the worst.

BRYAN].

I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. RYAN]. How much time have I remaining?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining remaining.

Mr. BLAND. Then I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] and two to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, nothing that can be said at this time will affect the fate of this bill, but those gentlemen who vote for it should do so with a full and clear understanding of what they are doing. We have been told, sir, that the Democratic platform adopted in 1892 demanded the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law. No person has brought into this House a single platform utterance which will bear out that assertion. The platform does not even demand repeal, not to speak of un-The platform does not even demand repeal, not to speak of unconditional repeal. It says: "We denounce the Republican legislation known as the Sherman act of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future, which should make all of its supporters, as well as its author, anxious for its speedy repeal." Its author does seem to be "anxious for its speedy repeal," and in this desire many of its supporters join with him; but why should a Democratic Congress secure that repeal without first restoring, at least, the law which the Sherman law repealed? Then, too, the denunciation contained in the platform is directed against the whole law, not simply against the purchase clause. Yet we are urged to support this bill for the unconditional repeal of the purchase clause only as a Demo-cratic measure. What is the history of this bill? It is identical in purpose and almost identical in language with a bill intro-duced by Senator SHERMAN July 14, 1892.

To show the similarity between the bill introduced then by Senator Sherman and the bill introduced since by Mr. WIL-SON of West Virginia, I place the two bills in parallel columns, and indicate by italics the words which appear in both bills:

motes thereon, and for other purposes."

Be it engcled by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the act approved July 14, 1850, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," as directs the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 \text{ or 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment for such purchases Treasury notes of the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; but this repeal shall not impoir or in any manner affect the legal-tender quality of the standard silver dollars heretofore coined; and the faith and credit of the United States are hereby pledged to maintain the parity of the standard gold and silver coins of the United States at the present legal ratio, or such other ratio as may be established by law.

Does the Senator from Ohio originate Democratic measures? The gentlemen who favor this bill may follow the leadership of Senator SHERMAN and call it Democratic; but until he is converted to true principles of finance I shall not follow him, nor will I apply to his financial policy the name of Democracy or honesty. [Applause.] The Wilson bill passed the House, but a majority of the Democrats voted in favor of substituting the Bland law in the place of the Sherman law before they voted for unconditional repeal, showing that they were not for unconditional repeal until Republican votes had deprived them of that which they preferred to unconditional repeal, namely, the Bland law. When the bill in its present form was reported to the Senate, four of the Democratic members of the Finance Committee opposed the bill and only two Democrats favored it. When the bill passed the Senate, twenty-two Democrats were recorded in favor of the bill and twenty-two against it, and that, too, in spite of the fact that every possible influence was brought to bear to secure Democratic support for the measure. Before a vote was reached thirty-seven Democratic Senators agreed to a compromise, so that this bill does not come to us expressing the free not come to us expressing the free and voluntary desire of the Democratic party.

Not only does unconditional repeal fail to carry out the pledge made in the last national platform, but it disregards the most important part of the financial plank in not redeeming the promise to maintain "the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal or charge for mintage. That promise meant something. It was a square declaration in favor of bimetallism. The tail to this bill, added in the Senate as an amendment, pretends to promise a future fulfillment of platform pledges. We are not here to promise, but to fulfill. platform pledges. We are not here to promise, but to fulfill. We are not here to renew platform pledges, but to carry them out. But even if it were our duty to postpone bimetallism and record another promise, the Senate amendment does not contain the vital words of the financial plank. The Senate amendment eliminates from the platform the important declaration in favor of "the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal or charge for mintage." To show the important difference between the Senate amendment and that part of our platform, I arrange them in parallel columns and designate the discarded words by italics.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.

DEMOCRATIC PLATFORM.
We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal or charge for mindage, but the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic and exchangeable value or be adjusted through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts.

THE SENATE AMENDMENT

THE SENATE AMENDMENT.
And it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to continue the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and to coin both gold and silver into money of equalintrinsic and exchangeable value, such equality to be secured through international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as will insure the maintenance of the parity in value of the coins of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debts. And it is hereby further declared that the efforts of the Government should be steadily directed to the establishment of such safe system of bimetallism as will maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts.

Were those important words stricken out by intention or was their purpose by their acts, those who prepared the platform never intended when it was written that it should be fulfilled after it had secured the suffrages of the American people.

When they had a strike at Homestend some time ago they used force to remedy what they considered their grievances. We said then that the ballot, not the bullet, was the means by which the American people redressed their grievances. [Applause.] What shall we say now when people elected upon a platform and pledged to a principle disregard those piedges when they come to the legislative halls? It is a blow at representative government which we can not afford to give. We are not sent here because we know more than others and can think for them. We are sent the proposed to the propose we know more than others and can think for them. We are sent here to carry out the wishes, to represent the interests, and opposed the rights of those who sent us. What defense can we make if this bill is passed? It is not demanded by the people; the farmers and laborers who constitute the great bulk of our people have never asked for it; those who speak for their organizations have never asked for it. those who speak for their organizations have never prayed for it.

So far as the laborer has been heard from, he has denounced unconditional repeal; so far as the farmer has been heard from, he has denounced unconditional repeal. Who gave the Eastern capitalists the right to speak for these men. It is a contest be tween the producers of wealth and those who exchange or absorb it. We have heard a great deal about business interests and business mendemanding repeal. Who are the business men? Are not those entitled to that name who are engaged in the production of the necessaries of life? Is the farmer less a business man than the broker, because the former spends three hundred and sixty-five days in producing a crop which will not bring him over a dollar a day for his labor, while the latter can make ten times the farmer's annual income in one successful bet on the future price of the farmer's product? I protest, Mr. Speaker, against the use of the nume business men in such a way as to exclude the largest and most valuable class of business men in the country. Unconditional repeal stops the issue of money. With this law gone, no more silver certificates can be issued, and no more silver bought. There is no law to provide for the issue of greenbacks. We must rely for our additional currency upon our share of the limited supply of gold, and the bank notes which national banks may find it profitable to issue.

Does anybody deny that our currency must increase as our population increases and as our need for money increases? Does any one believe that our need for money can be supplied without affirmative legislation? Is it any more wise to destroy the present means for increasing our currency before a new plan is adopted than it would be to repeal the McKinley tariff act without putting some other revenue measure in its place? Our platform says: "We denounce the McKinley tariff law enacted by the Fifty." says: "We denounce the McKinley tariff law enacted by the Fifty, first Congress as the culminating atrocity of class legislation," and "we promise its repeal as one of the beneficent results that will follow the action of the people in entrusting power to the Democratic party." We also demanded a tariff for revenue only. Is there any more reason for separating the repeal of the Sherman law from the enactment of bimetallic legislation than there is for separating the repeal of the McKinley bill from the enactment of a "tariff for revenue only" measure? Having harmonized with Mr. SHERMAN, shall we proceed to harmonize with Mr. ized with Mr. Sherman, shall we proceed to harmonize with Mr.

Mr. McKinley? There are many Republicans who tell us now that the prospect of tariff reduction has destroyed confidence to a greater extent than the Sherman law has. In order to avoid another manufactured panic will it be necesary to abandon another tenet of the Democratic faith and give up all hope of tariff reduction? Unconditional repeal will make it more difficult to restore free bimetallic coinage. It can not aid bimetallism without disappointing the dearest hopes of those gentlemen who are most active in its support. If it were not so serious a matter it would be interesting to note the mortification which must come either to the gold supporters or to the silver supporters of unconditional repeal. They are working in perfect harmony to secure exactly opposite results by means of this bill. Who will be deceived? This is only the first step. It will be followed by an effort to secure an issue of bonds to maintain gold payments. Senator Sherman, the new prophet of Democracy, has already stated that bonds must be issued, and we know that last spring the whole pressure of the moneyed interest was brought to bear to secure an issue of bonds then. Do you say that Congress would not dare to authorize the increase of the public debt in time of peace? What is there that this Congress may not dare to do after it has given its approval to the iniquitous measure now before us?

It has also been suggested that the silver dollars now on hand be limited in their legal-tender qualities. We need not be sur-prised if this suggestion assumes real form in attempted legislation. It has already been proposed to increase the circulation of national banks and thus approve of a policy which our party has always denounced. But we need be surprised at nothing now. The party can never undergo a more complete transformation upon any question than it has upon the silver question, if the representatives really reflect the sentiments of those who sent them here. We have been told of the great blessings which are to follow unconditional repeal. Every rise in stocks has been paraded as a forerunner of coming prosperity. I have taken occasion to examine the quotations on one of the staple products of the farm, and in order to secure a basis for calculation, I have

NEW YORK, October 81. Vesterday's vote by the Senate repealing the Sherman silver law did not have the effect on the stock market that the bulls expected. In the first place, London cabled orders to sell various stocks, much to the disappointment of local operators, who were confident that the action of the Senate would result in a flood of buying orders. The liquidations for foreign account induced selling by operators who had added to their lines on the belief that the repeal of the silver purchase act would instantaneously bring agout a boom. When it was seen that instead of buying the outside public was disposed to sell the weak-kneed bulls tried to get out.

Wheat was very weak throughout the entire session to-day. The opening was about 1 cent per bushel lower than the closing figures of Saturday, became weak, and after some minor fluctuations prices further declined 13 to 2, then held steady, and the closing was 2 to 2 lower than the last prices of Saturday. There was some surprise at the course of the market, which became consternation, and at one time amounted almost to a panic, when little or no reaction appeared and the price continued to sink. The fact of the matter was that traders were loaded with wheat and were merely waiting for the opportunity to sell. The bulge toward the end of last week gave them this chance and they we equick to take advantage of it. The silvar repeal bill having been discounted for several days had little or no effect in the matter of sustaining prices. New York stocks were weak and much lower and this speculative feeling was communicated to wheat. New Yorkers who have been the big bulls for so long were selling to-day, and it was said that there were numerous orders from abroad on that side of the market.

Is it possible that instead of money flowing to us, it is going to flow away in spite of repeal? The argument most persistently the advocates of repeal was that money would at once flow to this country from Europe and relieve us of our stringency in the money market. The business centers became impatient because the Senate insisted upon a thorough discussion. of the papers even suggested that the Senate ought to be abolished because it stood in the way of the restoration of confidence. Finally the opposition was worn out, the bill was passed, just as the metropolitan press demanded, and behold it was greeted in the market by a general decline. We may now expect to hear that the vague, indefinite, and valueless tail added in the Senate as an amendment has prevented returning confidence, and that it is our highest duty to repeal the caudal appendage of the Wilson bill, just as the repeal of the purchase clause of the Sherman law was demanded. For twenty years we have denounced the demonstization act of 1873, and yet we are now prepared with our eyes open, fully conscious of what we are doing, to perpetrate the same crime. We leave silver just where it was left then, except that there was provision then for trade dollars which this bill does not contain. You may assume the responsibility, I shall not.

The line of battle is laid down. The President's letter to Governor Northen expresses his opposition to the free and unlimited coinage of silver by this country alone. Upon that issue the next Congressional contest will be fought. Are we dependent or independent as a nation? Shall we legislate for ourselves or shall we beg some foreign nation to help us provide for the financial wants of our own people?

We need not fear the result of such a contest. The patriotism of the American people is not yet gone, and we can confidently await their decision.

[Mr. WHEELER of Alabama withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] has expired.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, when Congress assembled in August last we were in the midst of one of the most disastrous commercial crises which ever afflicted this country.

The President of the United States called Congress together to enact such legislation as might be expedient to avert if possible the calamity which was then upon us. It was believed by a majority of this House that one of the chief causes of that commercial crisis was what is known as the silver-purchasing clause of the Sherman act.

This House proceeded promptly therefore to repeal that clause. On the 28th day of August the repe ding bill passed this House by a very large majority. It was then predicted by the friends of repeal that this repeal would be followed by prosperity, that it would restore public confidence; and we have now had the benefit of nearly three months of experience since that time. I desire to call attention to the changed condition of the country since the passage of this bill through the House, which gave the assurance that the repeal would be enacted into law.

Last week I addressed the leading commercial agency of the United States, Messrs. Dun & Co., of New York, and requested a statement showing the comparative values of leading stocks and produce between the time the bill pussed this House and Saturday last, when the assurance was given to the country of the prospective passage of the bill in the Senate.

I have the the report from that commercial agency in my hand, and I desire to call the attention of the country to it. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Bland] says this was a stock-jobbing crisis. I do not know whether it was manipulated by the stockjobbers or not, but I know that there was a crisis upon us which has not yet been entirely averted. I know that everything was prostrated.

prostrated.

I am glad to state that nearly all of the evils which then afflicted the country have passed away. I will ask consent to print this statement in the RECORD, and I call attention to a few prominent features of it. This statement says:

At the date you name, August 28, the country was recovering from the almost complete paralysis of domestic exchange which had prevailed, but currency was still at a premium of 1 to 2 per cent, commercial paper was almost unsalable, and 20 to 50 per cent was bid for time loans with good collateral.

collateral.

Since that time domestic exchange has been fully restored, the premium on currency has disappeared, commercial loans of good character are sought, and with good collaterals money lends at 3½ per cent on time, etc.

It is also stated that the prices of railroad stocks have increased from $45.61 to $53.24 per share, which is an increase of $7.63 a share on the entire capitalization of railroad stocks in this country, an increase in the market value of such stocks since the passage of this bill through the House of $763,000,000. And a like increase has taken place in other stocks.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. No; I can not yield, I have only five min-The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois declines to yield.

Mr. SNODGRASS. What about the price of farm products? Mr. SPRINGER. I was just going to refer to the increase in products of the soil; and it will be found that wheat has increased in price 3 cents a bushel, which would, upon an average of one year's crop in this country, be an increase of $15,000,000. It means, on corn, on an average crop, $37,000,000; on cotton, on an average crop, it will be $23,000,000, and on oats nearly $40,-000,000; and thus, on four leading products of the farm, the increase on what would be the yearly average crop is more than $115,000,000, and yet gentlemen tell us that prices have been depreciated by this legislation. A similar increase has been realized on all other farm products since this House in August last gave assurance to the country that the repeal bill would soon become the law of the land. Thus the extra session has been justified and the wisdom of repeal has already been vindicated.

[Here the hammer fell.]
The following is the letter of R. G. Dun & Co., to which reference was made in Mr. Springer's remarks, and which is printed under the general leave of the House to print:

THE MERCANTILE AGENCY R. G. DUN & Co., 314 and 316 Broadway, New York, October 28, 1893. DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 27th the following data are submitted, and as the details are more fully set forth each week in our weekly publication, Dun's Review, copies of that paper for August 26—October 28, inclusive, are also forwarded to you. Therein will be found in condensed form a statement of the condition of business in its different departments each week, with brief extracts from the telegrams forwarded by our offices in different parts of the country.

At the date you name, August 28, the country was recovering from the almost complete paralysis of domestic exchange which had prevailed, but currency was still at a premium of 1 to 2 per cent, commercial paper was almost unsalable, and 30 to 30 per cent was bid for time loans with good collateral. Since that time domestic exchange has been fully restored, the premium on currency has disappeared, commercial loans of good character are sought, and, with good collaterals, money lends at $\frac{3}{2}$ per cent on time. The New York banks then had less than $\frac{3}{2}$,000,000 reserve, and now hold over $157,000,000; the deposits were then $\frac{3}{2}$,000,000 and are now nearly $433,000,000. A similar change has been seen at other cities. The clearing-house certificates, which banks here were compelled to issue for settlement between them selves, have substantially all been retired, as well as all issues at Boston, more than three-quarters of the amount issued at Philadelphia, and the amounts issued at nearly all other cities. In general, the banking and circerory paralysis has passed away, and whereas the liabilities of banks failing in August, not including mortgage, loan, and trust companies, exceeded $25,000,000, the amount fell in September to about $1,000,000, and, though larger during the present month, is yet comparatively small.

The failures of commercial houses and traders numbered 1,838 in August, being most numerous about the middle of the month, and the aggregate of liabilities was over $55,000,000. In October the number of failures has failed to about $1,550, but the decrease in importance has been greater, the aggregate liabilities of firms failing for the month nearly ended being about $20,000,000.

Frices of stocks began to rise as soon as the House had acted on the silver.

out find the average for the month hearly ended being about $90,000,000.

Prices of stocks began to rise as soon as the House had acted on the sible fill, and the average for the sixty most active stocks, which was $45.61 per share August 28, has advanced to $53.24 per share, while the average of four teen most active industrial and trust stocks, which was $44.86 August 28, has advanced to $61.54 per share. In the journals forwarded to you will be found prices every day of a few stocks having the largest sales each week, with the average daily of the two classes above named.

Prices of products have generally advanced, though rather for such as are handled in speculative markets than for those which depend upon actual consumption to fix prices. The general advance in prices of all products of which records are kept has been about 2 per cent, but in most manufactured products there has been no advance or some decline. In the more important staples of commerce prices August 28 and at this date compare thus:

Commodities.	October 28.	August 28.	Increase.
Wheat	$0,7050	80. 6750	80. 300
CornOats	. 4700	. 4525	. 175

The volume of business represented by exchanges through all clearing houses outside New York, which was but $1,413,000,000 in August, has risen to about $1,700,000,000 in October, and for the two weeks ending September 2; it was $572,000,000, but for the last two weeks it has been $837,000,000. Much of this increase is due to the regular change in business from August to October. The movement on railways also shows improvement. Last week, for the first time in several months, the earnings reported exceeded those on the same roads for the corresponding week last year, though but slightly. In August the decrease on over one hundred and thirty railroads was 13 per cent, and at the close of that month over 16 per cent, while the decrease in October, as thus far reported, is less than 4 per cent.

Industries have to some extent recovered from their prostration in July and August, though not greatly. Until the latter part of August, reports of establishments closing or reducing force every week exceeded the number resuming work or increasing force, but now each week brings some increase in the number reported in operation. Comparatively few of the iron works which stopped have yet resumed, though the output of pig fron, which declined from 181,551 tons weekly May 1st to 83,434 September 1st, and still further to 73,895 tons weekly October 1st, appears to have recovered a little. The consumption in manufacture is still less than half the usual quantity. The sales of wool at the principal Eastern markets, which amounted to only 6,484,787 pounds in four weeks of August, have been 9,207,152 pounds in three weeks of October, and though only part of the woolen machinery is yet in operation, there has been a considerable increase.

The takings of cotton by Northern spinners, though 101,000 bales or 37 per cent less since September 1 than for the same period last year, has been larger of late, and most of the cotton mills have resumed. The shipment of boots and shoes from Hoston are not yet larger than in August and are abou

Hon. W. M. Springer,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Mr. HUDSON withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Livingston].

Mr. Livingston. Mr. Speaker, this is a vital question to the people I have the honor in part to represent, and I shall vote against this bill for these reasons: First, the tendency of the measure, if it becomes a law, is to decrease the volume of currency, and to enhance the purchasing power of money, and to depress the prices of products.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say this: That I do not see how any man who is in favor of better prices to labor and for the products of the farm and shop can vote for this measure. I am opposed to it for another reason. That is, this declaration in the amendment of the Senate places the whole matter under an international agreement. I am not willing to submit the destinies of this great people to the whims and the wishes of London, of Germany, or any other European power, or any financial power across the waters. As an American, as a Southern man, as a member of the United States Congress, I declare in my place that in my opinion it is a shame that this great country should adopt a bill containing such a declaration as this.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Submitting this matter to an international agreement with Germany, England, indeed with all Europe committed against silver and in favor of a single gold standard, they being creditor nations, we a borrowing nation, is equivalent to "going to hell for justice and the devil sitting as judge." If this is the hope for silver as a money equal and upon a parity with gold, we might as well save the expense of such an international conference and bow the knee to such financial legislation as may be dictated from beyond the waters.

Mr. SNODGRASS. And are you not also opposed to it for the reason that this bill is a travesty upon the platform and record of the party?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am also opposed to it because it is not in harmony with the platform upon which you, Mr. Speaker, and I were elected. I am opposed to it for that additional rea-

Mr. Speaker, this Senate amendment is a square dodge, and a reckless abandonment of the Democratic platform upon the silver question. What will the Democratic masses say of it, and our promises unfulfilled. To them and to them only can we appeal from and after this day. If they are benefited by it, then a satisfied and shall stand ready to recant my opinions and reverse my action; if not, then I commend this Democratic House, Senate, and Administration to their tender mercies, when the day comes for them to pass upon our action upon this question. I yield back to the gentleman who so kindly gave me three minutes whatever remains.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Illinois stated that he desired to print something in the RECORD. The Chair will submit that proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. The letter from which I read. The SPEAKER. And which the gentleman did not have time to read.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen may have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. and also that gentlemen desiring to do so may print remarks in the RECORD on this subject.
Mr. SNODGRASS. I object.

Mr. BLAND. We have had no opportunity for debate, and I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen have leave to print remarks on this bill in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unamious consent for general leave to print remarks on this bill.

Mr. SNODGRASS. As we have not had time to reply to the statement read by the gentlemen from Illinois, I shall object to having it printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I would like to ask in connection with that, that there be unamious consent given for any gentleman who has spoken to extend his remarks, or those who will speak upon it to extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. That has been granted on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. Mr. BOATNER. I understand that extends to all those who have spoken and those who desire to print remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. That was submitted and agreed to, as the

The SPEARER. That was submitted and agreed to, as the Chair understands.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I have not the slightest desire to mingle in the discussion so far as it has proceeded, nor do I intend to make this the occasion for any suggestion as to the natural disappointment of orators who have preceded me. I told the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN] some time ago that he would find out the difference between promise and perthat he would find out the difference between promise and per-formance when we came to actual business. That the country is undoubtedly better off whenever the Democratic party disappoints it, I do not dobut. [Laughter.] In some respects I might hope that this disappointment would continue. I have given at length my reasons for the view which I have taken of the question which is before the House. I have nothing to add to that statement of reasons. With those reasons and with the result, I have not that confidence which some gentlemen have, who either know more than I do or less than I do. [Laughter.]

This is a very serious and important experiment in the history of this country, which had to be tried in obedience to the wish of the people. I hope it may turn out to be advantageous to the people in every way. Congress has at last, after a long time, done its duty, but it has robbed the measure of a very great deal done its duty, but it has robbed the measure of a very great deal of the advantage that it would have had under other circumstances had it been sooner disposed of. I have suggested that this silver legislation, begun in 1878, was an exciting cause of our troubles; whether it was any more than that, time will show. For my part I shall not be surprised to see great industrial misfortunes happen to this country. In my judgment it will be which I have already pointed out, that this country does not know and never will know until the action takes place, what the purpose and intention of the parties in power are.

Those parties themselves do not know. The consequence is that this country is prostrate under general uncertainty. More-that this country is prostrate under general uncertainty. More-over, the whole industrial system of this country is subject to change. That change is imminent and threatening. It will be found that this underlies our present condition, that this is the main cause of the misfortunes which have happened and which will happen to us in the coming winter. However much such misfortunes might inure to any temporary party advantage, I sincerely hope that they may not prove to be as great as those who are wiser than I anticipate. [Applause on the Republican who are wiser than I alterplace in the side.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY].
Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I have but a minute. I could easily consume many minutes, and even hours, in expressing my sense of gratitude to the gentlemen here, my colleagues, who have intrusted me with the discharge of certain duties during the discussion of this bill which we are now about to vote

In behalf of those who were associated under the command of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] in the active work of organizing the forces favoring the bill, permit me to thank the Republicans on both sides of the question, and our friends the Populists, all of whom have treated us with great kindness during the time of debate in connection with this measure. Mr. Speaker, the vote which is about to be taken is the culminating event in the long struggle which has been carried on for years by friends of the people who are in favor of sound gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from New York be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire more time. Several members objected. Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I yield the gentleman from

New York one minute more.

New York one minute more.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, in that additional minute I simply desire to say that I regard this as the end of a great struggle wherein the American people have finally and in decided terms expressed their purpose that nothing but an absolutely sound currency shall be issued by the Government of the United States. During the debate to-day one of our friends who is opposed to this bill has claimed that we have been following the directions given us by one of the Senators from the State of Ohio. I will not take issue with him as to what his opinion may be; but, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, and those gentlemen on the Democratic side with whom I have acted, we know that we have been following the lead of the man whom the people. that we have been following the lead of the man whom the peo-ple of this country elected by an enormous majority, Grover Cleveland, the present President of the United States. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia has one minute remaining.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the argument upon this bill has been closed. Both Houses of Congress have, after long and deliberate consideration, recorded their judgment after long and deliberate consideration, recorded their judgment upon it with an emphasis that can not be misunderstood, and which now can neither be strengthened nor weakened by anything that might be said at this stage of its history. I have recognized from the beginning, sir, that there were honest and sincere differences of opinion upon this measure by honest, sincere, and patriotic representatives of the people. Which side has been right the future alone can decide. If the passage of this bill shall bring to this country but a small part of the blessings which its friends prophesy concerning it, if it shall restore confidence, quicken enterprise, and bring once more returning prosperity to the people of the country, then the judgment of its friends will be justified, and its opponents will stand before history as honest, patriotic, but mistaken men.

Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRYAN. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed a minute longer.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. If, on the other hand, it should bring one-tenth of the evils which its enemics prophesy, then the judgment of its opponents will be justified, and its friends will stand before history as honest, patriotic, but mistaken men.

Mr. Speaker, I ask a vote on the bill; and I call for the yeas

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri[Mr. BLAND], as the Chair understands, desires to make a motion to recommit. Mr. BLAND. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, with instructions to report it back with the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the Senate amendment the following:

"And to provide for carrying into effect the policy of the foregoing declaration and that so much of the act of January 18, 1837, in regard to the establishment of a mint and relating to the coins of the United States as relates to and provides for the coinage of the standard silver dollar of 412 grains of standard silver is hereby revived and reenacted into full force and effect."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit, as made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I demand the previous question on that motion.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question will be considered as ordered.

on the general question.

Mr. BRYAN. Only three or four minutes.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Nebraska will be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

There was no objection: There was no objection.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, when this question came up today, on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia, a demand for the previous question was made at the time the main question was submitted. There were some of us who believed that those in favor of the bill should take all of the responsibility, and provide all of the means for its passage through this body.

In our opinion it is a measure fraught with infinite possibilities

In our opinion it is a measure fraught with infinite possibilities for mischief if not remedied by subsequent legislation.

We have believed it would bring to this country more of misery, as someone has said, "than war, pestilence, and famine;" and feeling impressed with the importance of the measure to our people we felt justified in exercising every parliamentary right given to us under the rules of the House to prevent its passage. We have seen those who believed with us in the Senate stand up for two months protesting against the passage of the measure and in opposition to what we consider a crime. We saw them refusing within two hours of the time when the vote was finally taken to consent to allow a vote. We saw them insisting that those who favored the measure should pass it without any that those who favored the measure should pass it without any that those who favored the measure should pass 12 without any shadow of consent from its opponents.

This proceeding is not new. This House has time and again, on important questions, seen the minority refuse to take any part in the proceedings or aid in any manner to pass through the House measures to which they were conscientiously opposed. They have even refused to vote, so that those in favor of the manufacture might be compelled to make a quorum of their own They have even refused to vote, so that those in favor of the proposition might be compelled to make a quorum of their own members. It was our desire to compel those in favor of the bill to use every means in their power to carry out the purpose in view, so that there should be hereafter no chance for anyone to assert that we had yielded one inch in our opposition to the measure and thereby permitted it to become a law.

I made dilatory motions and intended to do so until the Committee on Rules brought in a rule, and the House adopted it, making it impossible to earry such proceedings any further. I was on my feet, and I thought in time, to make a dilatory motion when the demand for the previous question was submitted by the Chair. I found that there were too few of those who were opposed to the measure willing to join in dilatory opposition to the extent even of calling for the yeas and nays.

Realizing that there are too few of us in the opposition who are willing to longer delay a vote, we believe it is useless to carry our opposition further. If I thought that refusing to vote would are willing to longer delay a vote, we believe it is useless to carry our opposition further. If I thought that refusing to vote would compel the friends of the measure to bring a quorum here, and that by so refusing I could prevent the passage of this bill or delay it, earrying out what I believe to be my duty to my constituents, I would gladly refuse to vote and would gladly do anything else in my power to prevent the perpetration of what I believe to be a crime against the people.

Having said this much, Mr. Speaker, and explained why I will not carry dilatory tactics further, I simply desire to add, inconclusion, that if we are right in the opposition we have made to this bill time will vindicate the correctness of our position. I hope that we are wrong. I hope that the influences back of the measure are not what we believe them to be. I hope its purposes are better than we think they are. I hope that this legislation will be far more beneficial to the people of this country than we can believe it will be. If we are right, and the bill now about to be passed produces the misfortunes which we believe will follow its enactment, I warn the people responsible for its passage that there will be a day of reckoning.

If the bill means that this country is not able to legislate for itself end rouse and some foreign nection to case it I feet and

The lines of battle are laid down, and in the next Congressional election the battle will be fought out, and unless I mistake the patriotism of the American people they will declare that the patriotism of the American people they will declare that this country is great enough and grand enough and strong enough to legislate for its own people on every question without the aid or consent of any foreign nation, either expressed or implied. You may think that you have buried the cause of bimetallism; you may eongratulate yourselves that you have laid the free coinage of silver away in a sepulchre, newly made since the election, and before the door rolled the veto stone. But, sirs, if our cause is just, as I believe it is, your labor has been in vain; no tomb was ever made so strong that it could imprison a righteous cause. Silver will yet lay aside its grave clothes and its shroud. It will yet rise, and in its rising and its reign will bless mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I now demand the previous question on the motion to concur in the Senate amendments.

The yeas and nays were ordered. The question was taken; and there were -yeas 194, nays 94, not voting 65; as follows:

The President has thanked the other side, and we have to-day heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. Tracey] thank them for the slight assistance they had rendered him in his leadership of the other side, and I understand Mr. Sherman is going to thank them. Now, I hope my thanks will be taken as an offset to all these others. Gentlemen, you have stood by me nobly. MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendment No. 6 to the bill (H. R. 4177) "to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. Cockrell, Mr. Gorman, and Mr. Cullom as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 591) to donate to the county of Laramie, Wyo., certain bridges on the abandoned Fort Laramie military reservation, and for other purposes; and A joint resolution (S. R. 37) to provide for the printing of a history and digest of the international arbitrations to which the United States was a party, and for other purposes.

EXTRA COMPENSATION OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution of inquiry, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved. That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives whether claims of letter-carriers for compensation for excess of eight hours service per day, under the act of May 24, 1888, as decided by the Court of Claims, March 7, 1882, are being received or can be received, adjusted, and paid, or certified to Congress for appropriation, without the intervention or services of attorneys.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, let that be referred to the committee. I believe it is a resolution of that class which should receive the consideration of a committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would say to the gentleman from Tennes-see [Mr. McMILLIN] that this will take but a moment. Mr. McMILLIN. The resolution relates to an appropriation. It is a fiscal matter which I think should receive the consideration of the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me to make a statement, I will say that I have consulted with the chairman of the committee, who thinks the resolution a proper one.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the committee are of that opinion, it will be but short work to report the resolution back to the House. I think a resolution involving an appropriation or expenditure of money should at least receive the deliberative consideration of a ommittee of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well, I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Cominittee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bills, fellower than the part of an act approved July 14, 1890, entitled, "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes;" when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That, beginning with the first day of the regular session of the Fifty-third Congress, to wit, the first Monday in December, 1893, in lieu of being engrossed, every bill and joint resolution in each House of Congress at the stage of the consideration at which a bill or joint resolution is at present engrossed shall be printed, and such printed copy shall take the place of what is now known as, and shall be called, the engrossed bill or resolution, as the case may be, and it shall be dealt with in the same manner as engrossed bills and joint resolutions are dealt with a tpresent, and shall be sent in printed form, after passing, to the other House, and in that form shall be dealt with by that House and its officers in the same manner in which engrossed bills and joint resolutions are now dealt with.

Resolved, That when said bill or joint resolution shall have passed both Houses, it shall be printed on parchment, which printshall be in lieu of what is now known as and shall be called the enrolled bill or joint resolution, as the case may be, and shall be dealt with in the same manner in which enrolled bills and joint resolutions are now dealt with.

Resolved, That the Joint Committee on Printing is hereby charged with the duty of having the foregoing resolutions properly executed, and is empowered to take such steps as may be necessary to carry them into effect, and provide for the speedy execution of the printing herein contemplated.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be author-fixed to have printed and bound such papers and documents for the use of said committee as it may deem necessary in connection with subjects con-sidered by the committee during the present Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.
Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEADOCK] wishes to submit a conference report, as the Chair understands

EXTENSION OF TIME TO MINING CLAIMANTS.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims.

The report of the committee of conference and the statement of the House conferees appear in the proceedings of Tuesday.

Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, the House bill extended the time within which a certain amount of labor required by the statute should be performed in the year 1893. The Senate amended that by providing that the law should apply only to those States or the adjoining States where the mining claims were located. That was disagreed to, and the bill was modified so that it should exclude from its operations South Dakota. Similar statutes have been passed in regard to Alabama, Missouri, and other States relating to mining claims.

relating to mining claims.

Chapter 91 of the Supplement to the Revised Statutes, page 104, is a law passed in 1576, excluding the States of Missouri and Kansas from the provisions of the act of Congress to promote the development of the mining resources of the United Strtes, and the law was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in 115 United States Reports, page 403.

In 1883 Alabama was excepted from the laws relating to mineral lands (Supplement to Revised Statutes, 104). The bill, having been reported unanimously by the House Committee on Mines and Mining, passed the House: passed the Senate with Mines and Mining, passed the House; passed the Senate with the amendment already referred to, which was changed in con-ference to the provision now reported, excepting the State of South Dakota, and the situation in the mining regions demanding prompt action. I move the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. RAY. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to cut off debate upon this question at this time.

Mr. WEADOCK. That will allow thirty minutes for debate. Mr. BLANCHARD. No; you have already had debate.
Mr. WEADOCK. How much time does the gentleman want?
Mr. RAY. I do not know that I shall want any great length of time myself, but I think that perhaps some other gentlemen may desire to speak on the subject.

Mr. WEADOCK. Will the gentleman indicate some time he desires!

Mr. RAY. I should not desire, as I say, any great length of time myself, but I dislike to have other members of the House cut off if they desire to say anything on the subject.

Mr. WEADOCK. I will yield the gentlemen five minutes.

Mr. RAY. Well, I do not—

Mr. WEADOCK. Is there any other gentleman who desires

Mr. RAY. I do not desire to speak on a matter of this kind with my mouth closed in advance. If the gag rule is to be applied to me, I want it applied in the very first instance. I would Mr. RAY.

rather have it applied when I am prepared for it. If the gentheman has a measure here for adoption by this House that he is afraid to have discussed, why then apply this rule to it; but this is a matter of some considerable consequences. It is a proposition that I do not approve. The principle of it, Mr. Speaker, is wrong; and I do not believe members of this House, when they understand it, will desire to commit themselves to it. Now, I ask the gentleman to allow us to discuss it before he moves the previous question.
Mr. WEADOCK. Iyielded five minutes to the gentleman, and

I suppose he is taking his time.

Mr. RAY. No, sir; I am not taking my time.
Mr. WEADOCK. Then I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. PENCE].

Mr. RAY. Idesire to know, in the first place, whether the gentleman proposes to insist upon his motion for the previous question?

Mr. WEADOCK. I shall, unless the gentleman desires time If he does, it will be granted; if not I will press for a vote upon the previous question.

Mr. PENCE. That is certainly fair.

Mr. RAY. Do you insist on limiting me to five minutes?
Mr. WEADOCK. No; if you desire it, I will yield to you for fifteen minutes; but I would like to have a vote on the previous question.

Mr. RAY. I will state to the gentleman that I do not pro-ose and do not desire to be limited to five minutes. I do not think that I want to speak ten minutes on the subject, but I would like such time as I find necessary.

Mr. WEADOCK. I will give the gentleman ten minutes.
Mr. RAY. Will not the gentleman listen to me? I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that I desire ten minutes, but I do not desire think, Mr. Speaker, that I desire ten minutes, out I do not desire to be cut off in the midst of what I may desire to say. I have not the slightest idea that I should occupy ten minutes. I will not make a prolonged windy speech, nor talk to occupy time. I simply desire that the gentleman will give me such time as I may find necessary in which to express my objections to this proposition.

Mr. WEADOCK. I will yield the gentleman fifteen minutes.

Mr. RAY. That is satisfactory.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Pence] desires to speak at this time, and, with the permission of the gentleman in charge of the bill, I will yield to him and reserve my

Mr. WEADOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Pence].

Mr. PENCE. I amgrateful to the gentleman from New York, and also to the chairman of the committee. The gentleman from New York has made a suggestion which, up to this time, has not been made by anyone; that is, that there is objection on principle to the main proposition of this bill. The purpose of the bill is to suspend the operation for this year of one section of the mining statutes. Let me make the members of the House acquainted with some facts of which probably very few of them have had knowledge until now.

The maximum extent of a mining claim in the region that has been hit so hard here to-day already is 1,500 feet in length by 300 feet in width. In round figures that is 10 acres in area. The United States statute requires that upon each unpatented mining claim there shall be performed in each calendar year by the claimant there of $100 worth of manual labor. There is no revenue to the State from this, no revenue to the Government. It is simply a condition upon which the claimant may hold his claim. The people of the section of country in which these mining claims are located have been so prostrated since last June by the course of foreign powers, by the course of the Administration, or by the conditions that have overwhelmed them, whatever may have been the cause of those conditions, that the owners of these unpatented mining claims, by thousands, have been compelled to quit work upon their claims and seek employment elsewhere.

To-day in Colorado, under the vote of this morning, it is no exaggeration to say that there are 10,000 horny-handed, worthy, deserving miners who are looking for the last time into the shalts where lie buried the hopes and labors of their lives, and calculating how much it will cost them to get back to their wives' people to spend the winter. Next spring they will be calculated ing upon finding employment elsewhere, with the hope that something will happen to encourage them to turn their faces again to the country where their mining claims are. The only purpose of the bill now proposed, the policy that the gentleman from New York suggests objection to, is that for this year, 1893, the operation of the law which requires claimants to perform upon their claims $100 worth of labor—which amounts to a tax of $10 per acre, there being about 10 acres in a claim-shall be suspended so that the men may be free to go elsewhere to find employment or sustenance for this winter; that and nothing

It simply provides that the operation of that law shall be sus-It simply provides that the operation of that law shall be suspended, not for any great length of time as was originally proposed, but for this year only, that it may be known and understood that that is the policy of the Government; and the amendment to which the gentleman from New York mainly objects, I imagine, is the exception that is made for the State of South Dakota. to that, I care not to indulge in discussion. In the five minutes allotted to me I could not. Suffice it to say, that, as I am in-formed, both the Senators and the Members from the State of South Dakota desire this exception, and feel that so far as their miners are concerned, they do not wish the operation of the statute suspended.

But, excepting in South Dakota, it is the earnest desire, prayer, and appeal, made here to-day in behalf of all the miners and mining claimants of all the mining States and Territories that this bill as recommended by the committee presided over by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr.WEADOCK] shall be passed. I hope that no trivial objection, no objection which rests upon anything in the world save a purpose to do the greatest good to the greatest number, will prompt the utterances of the gentle-man from New York, or will prompt his or any member's action in this matter

[Here the hammer fell.] Mr. WEADOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from

Montana [Mr. HARTMAN.]
Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to add a few words in support of the bill brought in here for the purpose of relieving the miners of the mining States from the requirement of doing the representative work which has been heretofore required of them by the law. I know it to be a fact that all over the inter-mountain States there are thousands and thousands of miners who are unable, by reason of the hard times now existing, to perform the requisite amount of labor to hold their claims, and I hope that this Congress, which has already visited such hard-ship upon these miners by the passage of the bill repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, will not pile upon that these additional hardships by insisting on compelling them to perform this work.

I know it to be a fact that it has been requested here that South Dakota be excepted from the operation of this bill. I am advised by Representatives from that State that the reason they that position is that a large number of the owners of mining claims in that State are foreign corporations and private citizens amply able to perform the work necessary to be performed to represent their respective claims; and I presume that the statements of these Representatives who may be assumed to be best acquainted with the needs and requisites of their people should be considered in determining these questions.

But in our State the sentiment is different. I have had dozens and dozens-yes, at least a hundred-of letters asking that this bill may be passed at the hands of Congress. The men who send this request have some of them been devoting their time and their energies for years and years to representing the claims which they now possess. If this Congress refuses to them the privilege of still holding those claims without doing the representation work which the law has required, the expenditures of many years upon many claims will have to be forfeited and the claims given up. I hope that this Congress will see its way to the passage of the bill as has been suggested by the chairman of this committee

Mr. WEADOCK. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. Lucas].
Mr. Lucas. Mr. Speaker, I represent a district in which the condition of things is somewhat different from that existing in the districts of my friends from Colorado and Montana. It is my fortune to reside at the foot of the Harney Peak tin district, in which a foreign corporation, composed of English capitalists, controls twelve hundred mining claims together with the tin interests there; and it is their interest to have this law suspended as proposed by the gentleman from New York. In other parts of the Black Hills are two thousand other claims owned by foreign corporations and corporations belonging in other States. In my district a large number of citizens have claims belonging to themselves. Under the stress and paralysis of business prevailing to-day all over the country, as has been well stated by the gentleman from Colorado, these men do not know where bread and butter are to come from during the coming winter. bill be passed, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, so as to include South Dakota in its provisions, it will compel those men to abandon their homes and seek sustenance somewhere

In view of the fact that it is not irregular, that it is not unlawful, to make an exception for good reasons to the general provisions of a bill, we have asked the committee of conference to except my State; they have done so; and I appeal to this House to-day to respect the report of the conference committee, and, inasmuch as we do not desire the passage of a bill of this kind, exempt us from its operations.

It has been said by the gentleman from New York that he has a constituent who is interested in a mining claim in that country which he is not now able to operate. I say to him that I ive more than three thousand constituents in the sume situation. I beg of this House not to depart from the report of the conference committee.

Mr. WEADOCK. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I hear the gentleman from Colorado and some other gentlemen representing Western States says the state of the control ing to us that they must have this bill passed by this House; that it must become a law, that the conference report must be adopted in order that the poor laboring men of their States may be enabled to live during the coming winter; and then I hear the Representative from South Dakota saying that it will not do to pass this bill unless South Dakota be excepted from its provisions; that if that State be included in the operation of the bill, laboring men will be turned out into a cold and pitiless world and left to starve.

Now, there has been written upon the statute books of the United States for many years a law which provides that the owners of claims of this character must perform a certain amount of work-$100 worth of work-upon each claim each year. statute is in operation; it applies equally to all the States and to all the people of the United States having claims of this char-It is a fair and just law; but owing to the stringency of the times, owing to the circumstances over which none of us have any control, it became necessary that there should be brought into this House a general act, applying alike to all the States and all the citizens of the United States, to all people having mining claims, providing that the operation of this provision of the law should be suspended for one year. Now, it seems to me that what is good for one State is good for all the States; what is good for one locality is good for all localities.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If their circumstances are the same.

Mr. RAY. It seems to me that upon principle the Coagress of the United States can not afford to go into the business of changing general statutes for the benefit of localities, saying that as to one section of the country a particular law shall re-main in force but that as to another section it shall be inoperative, thus changing the law to suit local conditions and local wishes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I see the point which the gentleman is endeavoring to make; but let me ask, do not the conditions in these different localities—the mining regulations—differ?

Mr. RAY. Surely. Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Then, if the conditions are altogether different, why try to hold these several communities under the same general rule? While a thing may be very good under one set of conditions, it may be very bad under another.

Mr. RAY. Why, sir, here is a statute on this subject. It is general in its terms, applying equally to all the States and all the people of all the States. I do not find any such varying con-ditions as the gentleman describes or pictures.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the gentleman will refer to the mining laws applicable in the different localities where these mines are situated, he will see that there is a very great difference in the regulations under which mine-owners hold their

Mr. RAY. That may be; but here is a general statute as to the work that shall be performed each year on these claims. Now, the gentlemen representing South Dakota in this body and in the Senate claim that this bill should be enacted, but made applicable to Colorado and some of the other States only.

Mr. LUCAS. No, we do not claim that. Mr. RAY. Then you do not claim for a single minute that Mr. RAY.

this is a just or proper law to be enacted—
Mr. LUCAS. We do not want the law changed.
Mr. RAY. But you are satisfied that this bill shall be enacted into law if it be made applicable to all the States in the Union except South Dakots.

Mr. LUCAS. No, that is not the idea.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. RAY. I have but fifteen minutes.
Mr. WILSON of Washington. I wish to correct an error into which the gentleman is falling. The mining industries of South Dakota are based on gold and tin, while in our section of the country the basis of the mining industries is silver and lead. So that there is a great difference between the conditions existing in the two localities.

Mr. RAY. Well, I do not know that it makes any difference as to what the law should be, whether they are mining gold and lead, or mining gold and tin.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But it does as a matter of jus-

Mr. Vitalian tice and equity.

Mr. LUCAS. A very material difference.

Mr. RAY. These men having these claims are working the mines as the law now requires them to do—doing a hundred dollars' worth of work each year— Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What for? Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will th Will the gentleman yield for a

Mr.CLARK of Missouri. I merely wish to ask the gentleman if those persons engaged in the mining industries of this country ought not to be encouraged?

Mr. RAY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, now, if the law is fixed so that it suits the people of South Dakota and the balance of the mining country out there, why not let them have it?
Mr. LUCAS. That is it exactly.

Well, it may suit the Representatives from South Dakota who desire to strike simply at a foreign corporation which happens to own some claims in the State.

But, Mr. Speaker, I was about coming to the point of my ob-

Mr. RAY. Well, they may know more about it than the gentleman from Missouri knows, but I happen to know something about the facts relating to these mining claims myself; because I have a large number of gentlemen residing in my Congressional district

Mr. RAY. Now, gentlemen, I do hope that I will be allowed to have a little fragment of the time left to me in order to express my views on this question.

These gentlemen who happen to reside in my Congressional district, and are interested in this mining business are, as I have said, both Democrats and Republicans. It is not a political question. There is no foreign capitalist among them. They do not come from England or Germany or any other foreign country. They are American citizens. They are perfectly willing that this bill, as first proposed, should be enacted into law if they can have the benefit of it. But it does not seem right in practice or correct in principle that it should give benefits to certain sections or to classes of mine-owners in the United States because they happen to own claims in one State, and deny its benefits and privileges to another class of claimants who happen to own claims in South Dakota. All are citizens of the United States. All should come in under the general laws enacted by Congress, and should be entitled to the benefits of the general laws enacted on this subject, and if any burden is imposed on mine-owners or claimants let it apply to all alike.

have heard the representatives of the Democratic party on this floor advocate equality before the law and justice to all men so many times that I do not think you want to violate that prin-

so many times that I do not think you want to violate that principle in acting on this bill.

Mr. LUCAS. It is not a political question.

Mr. RAY. Now, I speak particularly for the men I represent. If this law is to be suspended as to claimants not residing in my State, and as to mining claims in Colorado and Nevada and other States, and is not to be suspended as to South Dakota, it is an act of inequality, and I simply ask that its provisions be made to extend to these men who own mining claims in South Dakota. If you wish to strike at these foreigners, this foreign corporation of which you make which have their place of husiness in English the state of the s of which you speak, which have their place of business in England, and perhaps the stockholders themselves reside in England, if you desire to strike at them, then make the provision in the bill in accordance with that idea; but do not impose any unnecesary hardship or restriction upon one class of our own people.

As to the citizens of the United States, I should think you would desire to let the provisions of the bill apply to all alike and operate on all alike. Because it does not is the reason I object to it in its present form. I do not advocate anything which will not ameliorate the condition of the miners in South Dakota, Colorado, Nevada, or any other State of the Union. What I ask for is equal and exact justice, and I do not believe, sir, that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Weadock] who has charge of this bill will commend or approve of the principle of the bill which excepts from its operations one State of the Union and leaves it to operate in all the others.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the reason why I am opposed to this amendment, as suggested. I can not act otherwise and be just to the people whom I represent, than to do what I can to oppose the adoption of this conference report.

The gentleman, it seems to me, should not say that because gentlemen from South Dakota state that they want their State excepted that therefore we will except them. Supposing the representatives of some other State should come in and say, "Except us from the provisions of this bill," would you except

Will you have a law upon the statute books which operates in one-half of the States of the Union, but which is inoperative in the other half of the States of the Union? Is that the kind of legislation we desire upon the statute books? Is that Democratic doctrine? When you come to adopt your tariff bill are registation we desire upon the statute books? Is that Democratic doctrine? When you come to adopt your tariff bill are you going to adopt one that shall be so framed as to suit the fancy of Massachusetts—

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Yes; that is exactly what they are going to do.

Mr. RAY (continuing). A tariff to suit the fancy of California, and so go around and have it operative in a portion of the States, and not operative in the other States?

Mr. WILSON of Washington. That is what they are going to do to please New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts, and let the West go.

Mr. RAY. O!no; nothing of the kind. I believe in general laws that shall apply to all our people. I believe in the American flag; and when it floats I wantit to protect all the people. I believe in the legislation of the Congress of the United States; but when we legislate, we should legislate for all the people, and pass those laws and only those laws which shall be applicable to all alike, which shall give benefit to all the people, or impose hunders upon all the people similarly situated, equally and give burdens upon all the people similarly situated, equally and alike.

Mr. BOATNER. How would a New York law that was to operate all over the United States suit the gentleman?

Mr. RAY. I do not advocate the adoption of a New York law to operate all over the United States, or in any section of the nation except New York.

Mr. BOATNER. A law that would suit New York people?

Mr. RAY. But I do believe that the laws of the United States should be so framed that they will operate everywhere within the boundaries of the United States uniformly and justly.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. WEADOCK. Mr. Speaker, if this was intended to remain permanently upon the statute books it might be a question hether or not one particular State should be exempted But that question, I submit, is not before the House. This is a bill intended to give relief to the miners in a large portion of the country; but the situation in South Dakota is such that those people would be benefited by the exemption of their State from the provisions of this bill. That is all there is to the matter. It is a temporary suspension of the statute requirement in favor of those who need the protection of the laws, and it seems to me it has been sufficiently discussed in the House.

I do submit that the Senators and Representatives from South Dakota are at least equally as well prepared to represent the wishes of their State, and to know the conditions of their people, as is the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

It is impossible, perhaps, to pass any law which will not temporarily inconvenience someone, but it seems to me that as a relief measure, calculated to meet the state of facts which unfortunately exists in that country, this bill ought to pass. I move the previous question upon the adoption of the report.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This bill simply gives relief to those who want it.

Mr. WEADOCK. Yes. I now move the previous question upon the adoption of the report. The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report. The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division [demanded by Mr. RAY], there were—ayes 134,

Mr. RAY. No quorum.
Mr. WEADOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a suggestion to my friend Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a suggestion to my friend from Michigan [Mr. WEADOCK]. There is probably no quorum present in the House at this time. This bill will come up as Richards, Ohio unfinished business in the morning. I suggest to the gentleman that we adjourn.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.
The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 199, nays 3, not voting 151; as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, November 2, 1893.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D. The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TELLER presented memorials of the Denver (Colo.) Typographical Union, and of the Denver (Colo.) Trades Assembly, remonstrating against the building of a new Government Printing Office by contract; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

He also presented a petition of the Denver (Colo.) Chamber of Commerce, praying that steamers between Mexican and Central or South American ports on the western coast of the United States, be required to stop for mail at San Diego, Cal.; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 823) to authorize the Missouri River Power Company of Montana to construct a dam across the Missouri River, reported it without amendment.

Mr. COKE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1139) to amend an act of Congress approved May 12, 1890, granting to the Aransas Pass Harbor Company the right to improve Aransas Pass, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WALTHALL. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 132) making an appropriation to enlarge the military post of Fort Meade, near the city of Sturgis, in the State of South Dakota, to report it adversely. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South versely. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] to the adverse report. He may want to have the bill placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have the bill go to the Calendar. I know nothing about it and would like to look into it.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WALTHALL from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 146) to establish a military post at or near the city of Pierre, Hughes County, in the State of South Dakota; and
A bill (S. 172) to establish a military post at or near the city of Grand Forks, in Grand Forks County, in the State of North Da-

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 810) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate a certain cannon to the Naval Veteran Association of Baltimore,

A bill (S. 1045) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate four obsolete gun carriages to the city of Marshalltown, Iowa.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to mining claims.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 53) to remit the duties on ammunition for naval ordnance imported by the Secretary of the Navy; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON WORLD'S FAIR EXHIBITS.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved February 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition, to restate the description of the committee of the control of the articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition, to report it back with an amendment, accompanied by a report which I will ask to have printed, and I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution. It has received the unanimous approval of every member of the committee now in the city and of some members who are absent. It is necessary to act upon the measure this morning in order to have it take effect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.
Mr. MORRILL. I will state that the whole of the joint resolution is stricken out except the last clause of the last section, which permits the new museum at Chicago to accept of any giff that may be made to it or to make any purchases that it may please to make.

Mr. CULLOM. Let the last clause be read by the Secretary. The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indi-

The Secretary read as follows:

That all foreign exhibits at such Fair acquired by contribution or purchase by the Columbian Museum of Chicago for its own use shall be wholly released from all customs duties.

Mr. CULLOM. I merely desire to say that in the other body there was no objection to this provision while there was objection to other portions of the joint resolution. This measure is thought to be only fair to those parties in Chicago who are undertiking to establish a great museum, and I hope there will be no objection to its adoption.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection the Senate as in Committee of the

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out all from the word "permit," in line 9, to the word "that," in line 46; so as to make the joint resolution read:

46; so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, 46., That the act approved April 25, 1890, entitled "An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the product of the soil, mine, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to permit all foreign exhibits at such Fair acquired by contribution or purchase by the Columbian Museum of Chicago for its own use, shall be wholly released from all customs duties.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the joint resolution and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferes on the part of the Senate, and Mr. Morrill, Mr. Harris, and Mr. McPherson were appointed.

DONATION OF ABANDONED CANNON.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 83) donating an abandoned cannon to the committee in charge of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1894; and I am instructed by the committee to ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be now considered. There is no possible objection to it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DETAIL OF ARMY OFFICERS TO COLLEGES.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3571) to increase the number of officers of the Army to be detailed to colleges, to report it favorably, with an amendment. I am also directed by the committee to ask unanimous consent that the bill be now considered. I think there can be no possible objection

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 8, after the words "United States," to insert:

And no officer shall be thus detailed who has not had five years' service in the Army, and no detail to such duty shall extend for more than four years; and officers on the retired list of the Army may, upon their own application, be detailed to such duty, and when so detailed shall receive the full pay of their rank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Nebraska, who reported the bill, what is the number added to the detail?

Mr. MANDERSON. The bill proposes an addition of twenty-five to the number now allowed by law. The amendment proposed by the committee simply requires that any officer of the Army who is detailed to one of these institutions shall have had five year's souries with his command and that he shall have five years' service with his command, and that no detail shall extend beyond four years, and it gives the privilege to the President to take officers from the retired list within that number who, when on such duty, shall receive the pay of their rank.

Mr. STEWART. Do I understand that this is a bill to regulate the number of effects when the state of th

Mr. MANDERSON. The bill increases the number.

Mr. STEWART. How many? Mr. MANDERSON. It increases the number 25.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bill and joint resolution, reported them adversely, and they were thereupon postponed indefinitely: A bill (S. 1079) to increase the number of officers of the Army

A bin (S. 1913) to be detailed to colleges; and
A joint resolution (H. Res. 61) authorizing the President to detail from the Army an officer to discharge the duties of commandant at the University of the State of Alabama.

W. W. ROLLINS.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2821) for the relief of W. W. Rollins, late collector fifth district, North Carolina, for value of stamps destroyed by fire at Winston, N. C., on November 13, 1892, to report it back without amendment. It is a bill of a single paragraph. I am also directed to ask unanimous consent that it be now considered. Let it be read for information.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of W. W. Rollins, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth collection district of North Carolina, with the sum of $1,565.04, being value of tobacco stamps destroyed by fire at the stamp office in Winston, N. C., on the night of November 13, 1892.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. Some two or three weeks ago I reported a Senate bill of precisely the same purport and it was placed on the Calendar. I move that the bill (S.874) for the relief of W. W. Rollins, collector of internal revenue for the fifth collection district of North Carolina, be indefinitely postponed.

RAILROAD IN INDIAN AND OKLAHOMA TERRITORIES.

Mr. ALLEN. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1021) to grant the right of way to the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern right of way to the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern Railway Company through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes, to report it with sundry amendments, and to ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was, in section 1, line 9, after the word "Territory," to insert "including lands that have been allotted to Indians in severalty or reserved for Indian purposes;" so as to read:

That the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern Railway Company reserved for Indian purposes;" so as to read:

That the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern Railway Company, a corporation created under and by virtue of the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, be, and the same is hereby, invested and empowered with the right of locating, constructing, equipping, operating, using, and maintaining a railway, telegraph, and telephone line through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, including lands that have been allotted to Indians in severality or reserved for Indian purposes, beginning at any point to be selected by said railway company on the south line of the State of Kansas, in the county of Montgomery, on the south line of section numbered 13 or section numbered 14, township numbered 35, range numbered 13 cast of the sixth principal meridian, or on the south line of section numbered 13 or section numbered 14, township numbered 35, range life astor the sixth principal meridian, and running thence by the most practicable route through the Indian Territory to the west line thereof, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 3, to strike out "Territory" and insert "Territories."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 2, after the word "occupants," to insert "by allotment under any law of the United States or agreement with the Indians or;" so as to read:

That before said railway shall be constructed through any lands held by individual occupants by allotment under any law of the United States or agreement with the Indians or according to the laws, customs, and usages of any tribe of the Indians, nations, or tribes through which it may be constructed, full and complete compensation shall be made to such occupant for all property to be taken or damage done by reason of the construction of said railway.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, line 12, after the word belongs," to insert "or in the case of an allottee or by his duly authorized guardian or representative;" so as to read:

In case of failure to make amicable settlement with any occupant, such compensation shall be determined by the appraisement of three disinterested referees, to be appointed, one (who shall act as chairman) by the President of the United States, one by the chief of the nation to which such occupant belongs, or in case of an allottee or by his duly authorized guardian or representative; and one by said railway company, who, before entering upon the duties of their appointment, shall take and subscribe, before a district judge, clerk of a court, or United States commissioner, an each that they will falthfully and impartially discharge the duties of their appointment, which caths duly certified shall be returned with their award to, and filed with, the Secretary of the Interior within sixty days from the completion thereof, and a majority of said referees shall be competent to act in case of the absence of a member, after due notice, and upon the failure of either party to make such appointment within, thirty days after the appointment made by the President, the vacancy shall be filled by the judge of the United States court for the first judicial division at Muscogee, Indian Territory, or by the judge of the United States court which has jurisdiction over said Indian reservation, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 9, line 3, before the word "years," to strike out "four" and insert "three;" so as to read:

That the said railway company shall build at least 100 miles of its railway in said Territories within three years after the passage of this act, and complete the main line of the same within two years thereafter, or the right herein granted shall be forfeited as to that portion not built.

Mr. HOAR. There are different prints of the child like to ask to what section the 1 st amendment is?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will indicate.

The SECRETARY. In section 9, line 3, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "three."

Mr. ALLEN. The amendment makes it conform to bills of like nature which have been passed heretofore.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to call attention to the provision for an appeal. Suppose there be a judgment for the defendant, a person having set up an unfounded claim for title, or in any other way set up a claim for d m ges when there are none, still the oosts are to be against the appellant. If there is a judgment of the referees in favor of the claimant, the railroad company ap-peal and prevail on the appeal, and if the judgment of the court shall be for the same or a less sum than the award of the referees, then the costs shall be adjudged against the appellant, that the prevailing party under the provision of the bill in the case I have supposed will be compelled to pay the costs. Is that the purpose of the Sen tor who has charge of the bill?

Mr. ALLEN. My attention has not been called to that branch of the case, but I suppose that would be just. I will state that the bill is in accordance with the bills which have heretofore been passed granting right of way over Indian reservations. It is almost identical in langua e with the Rock Island bill and other bills of that kind. Mr. HOAR. I suggest after the word "appellant," in line 53 of the print of the bill I have, in the third section, very near the end, to add:

Unless the judgment of the court shall be for the railroad company, in which case the costs shall be against the claimant.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think there can be any objection to that

Mr. HOAR. The word "appellant" occurs just before the semicolon, towards the close of the third section in the print of the bill I have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "appellant," in line 53, section 3, of the printed bill, insert:

Unless the judgment of the court shall be for the railroad company, in which case the costs shall be against the claimant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAM REVENUE CUTTER.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 3297) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for se vice on the Great Lakes. I am also instructed by the committee to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $175,000 for the construction of a steam revenue cutter of the first class for service on the Great Lakes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, or-dered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back adversely the bill (S. 994) providing for the construction of a steam revenue cutter for service on the Great Lakes. As the House bill takes its place, I move that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 1150) for the relief of Jane Vandever, widow of William Vandever, brevet major-general, United States Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pen ions.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 1151) to provide for the free and un imited coinage of silver; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, it was Ordered, That Harrison Flora be, and is hereby, authorized to withdraw from the files of the Senate, subject to the rules, all papers and documents filed by him to accompany Senate bill 26.8 at the first session of the Fiftieth Congress, and filed with Senate report 1193.

SESSION EMPLOYÉS AT MALTBY BUILDING.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved. That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he hereby is, authorized to continue the present session employés at the Maitoy Building authorized under resolution of July 26, 1892, during the coming recess of Congress.

ADDITIONAL MESSENGER FOR THE SENATE.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ an additional messenger at an annual salary of $1,440, to be paid from the niscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise provided.

PROF. SUESS ON FUTURE OF SILVER.

Mr. VOORHEES. I hold in my hand a translation of a very important work entitled The Future of Silver, by Eduard Suess, professor of geology at the University of Vienna, Austria, vice-president of the Imperial Academy of Science, member of the Austrian Parliament, etc. It is a work that the Finance Committee have investigated fully for some months back and ordered it printed for the way. dered it printed for the use of the committee. I submit it for the purpose of having it printed as a miscellaneous document.

Mr. President, one word more. We have estimated the expense of printing and it is so small that it does not come under the rule which requires it to be referred to the Committee on Printing. It can be printed for the sum of $100, possibly a little more, possibly a little less. I underst and a proposed maximum cost of $300 for printing has to go to the Committee on

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HILL. What is the title of the pamphlet?

Mr. VOORHEES. The Future of Silver, by Eduard Suess, professor of geology at the University of Vienna, Austria, viepresident of the Imperial Academy of Science, member of the Austrian Parliament, etc., translated by Robert Stein, United St tes Geological Survey, published by permission of the author and by the direction of the Committee on Finance. Senate of the United States. Prof. Suess is well known in the circles of finance. United States. Prof. Suess is well known in the circles of financial investigation.

Mr. HILL. I do not know that I have any objection to such a resolution, but we have been assured so many times by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. S. EWART] that silver would have no future, I do not know whether it will be of any particular value to print the pamphlet. mr. VOORHEES. This is not a resolution. I will say we the Senator from New York it is a translation, translated by order of the Finance Committee. We ordered a thousand copies swinted for our own use. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Allignated for our own use.] son!, who is not now here, when abroad gave the matter great attention, and regarded it as a very valuable work. The attention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Jones], who is a member of the Committee on Finance, was called to it, and his concurrence given. So I feel fully justified in having it treated with the respect I propose.

Mr. PASCO. May I ask the Senator from Indiana how many copies are to be printed under the rule?

Mr. VOORHEES. The usual number.
Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I regret that the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] did not pay more attention to the few observations I made during the recent debate.

Mr. HILL. A few observations, does the Senator say?

Mr. STEWART. I frequently declared that the act would utterly demonetize silver in this country, but I frequently asserted that silver would not die here, that the war had just commenced; and my belief that it will not die is founded to some extent upon the fact that I see now we shall be able to separate the sheep from the goats, and it will be difficult in the future fight for Senators to straddle the issue and be for and against giv r. I think in the next fight we shall have only those talking for silver who are on our side. If we can eliminate those who talk for silver and vote for monometallism, we shall be less embarrassed, and will probably be able to prosecute the fight with more success than we have done while embarrassed with the position of Senators occupying both sides of the question. Mr. HILL. If the publication of this pamphlet will give the Senator from Nevada any more information upon the subject than he has, I think it very import at that it should be published. It will also enable him. I suppose, to speak more at length upon the subject hereafter than he has done during the present session. I think the pamphlet ought to be published.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted the following report:

Mr. COUK RELL Sublitudes the following reposit.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 to the bill (H. The joint resolution (H. Res. 53) to remit the duties on ammunition for naval ordnance imported by the Secretary of the Navy was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM RECENT CYCLONE.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President—
Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Delaware will kindly give me his attention a moment, I gave notice yesterday that I desired to day to call up the bill (S. 1149) to relieve the sufferers from the recent cyclone on and near the sea islands by the coast of South Carolina and Georgia. I hope, as the Senator's bill will come up in regular order very soon, he will allow mo to make my motion before calling up the Chinese bill.

Mr. HOAR. I know. My appeal is to the Senator to allow me to make the motion of which I gave notice yesterday, to take up the bill for the relief of the sufferers by the recent cyclone. Mr. GRAY. Does the Senator suppose that his bill will lead to discussion?

Mr. HOAR. If it goes to the end of the morning hour the Senator's bill will come up of course then.

Mr. GRAY. I think there will be an opportunity for the Senator from Massachusetts to bring the matter up before the

Mr. HOAR. It is a very pressing matter, and I should like to have the sense of the Senate taken upon it. There are 30,000 people starving.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator will have an opportunity later in the day.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Delaware has absolute control of the Senate in regard to his measure, because it is the unfinished business and comes up, as of right, at the end of the morning hour. I hope he will not also insist on displacing this matter, of which notice was given yesterday.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to add my appeal to that of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GRAY. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts. Mr. HOAR. I move to take up Senate bill 1149.

Mr. COCKRELL. Only under the rules, for a second reading, after which I shall object to a third reading. Let the bill be read the second time.

Mr. COCKRELL, I object to the third reading now,

Mr. HOAR. I desire to have the rule reading now.
Arr. HOAR. I desire to have the rule read on which the Senator relies. I think it applies only to one reading.
Mr. COCKRELL. It is Rule XIV.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Rule XIV will be read by the Sec-retury.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XIV.

BILLS, JOINT RESOLUTIONS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

1. Whenever a bill or joint resolution shall be offered, its introduction shall, if objected to, be postponed for one day.

2. Every bill and joint resolution shall receive three readings previous to its passage; which readings shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise; and the Presiding Officer shall give notice at each reading whether it be the first, second, or third.

Mr. HOAR. Ishould like to have the RECORD or the Journal re d to show what took place yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the Journal entry.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Hoar introduced a bill (S. 1149) to relieve the sufferers from the recent cyclone on and near the sea islands by the coast of South Carolina and Georgia; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HOAR. Then the bill had its second reading.
Mr. FRYE. No; it was passed to a second reading.
Mr. HOAR. I am very sorry that my honorable friend from Missouri has exhausted the resources of ingenuity to prevent the Senate from exercising its opinion upon extending relief to these starving people. I will take the ruling of the Chair. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now taken up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? Mr. COCKRELL. I ob ect.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. HOAR. Is the motion in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the motion is in regard to it. Mr. HOAR. If the bill is before the Senate for a motion to refer, it is before the Senate to vote down the motion to refer and proceed to its consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. The rule expressly provides that after a

Mr. HOAR. And the second reading has taken place? Mr. HOAR. And the second reading has taken pince?
Mr. COCKRELL. The second reading has just taken place, and the third reading has been objected to at this time, but the question of reference comes on the second and before the third reading.

Mr. HOAR. Let the motion be made, and I will proceed to debate it. Let us have a division upon it.

Mr. GORMAN. I make the motion, Mr. President.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland, to refer the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I hope that reference will not be made.

I quite concur with the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] in the belief that generally such measures should be referred to an appropriate committee; but this is a measure of very pressing necessity. Some thirty thousand people are starv-ing to death, and the facts are reported from a source upon which the Committee on Appropriations would implicitly rely. Red Cross Society, a humane instrumentality of which the me-morialist, Miss Barton, is the leader, has by its agents gone to the stricken locality, and appealed to us, saying, among other things, that national aid is necessary for the relief of a calamity prevailing on such a large scale, and that it is impossible for private benevolence to relieve it. The statement is made that I pound of bacon and a peck of hominy are the only rations on which families of five or six persons are subsisting and supporting life for seven days.

That information comes from a source which no member of the Committee on Appropriations and no Senator will question for a moment, and the delay to another session of Congress, and to another meeting of the committee involves starvation on a huge scale, a case like that of the famine in Ireland, extending over 145 miles, nearly as great as the dimensions of the whole island of Ireland in some directions, from sea to sea. If Senators have constitutional objections to such a measure they, of course, should act upon them; but why this measure of relief should encounter all the ingenuities of parliamentary obstruction, I can not understand. I should think the Senator from Missouri, if he did not agree to our power to take this action, would at least be glad if Senators who thought differently could act upon it.

I have no interest in this question other than that of every American citizen. The people who are suffering are our fellow-citizens; the lady who is the president of this great national and international organization of the Red Cross, which has done so much to ameliorate the horrors of war throughout the civilized world, happens to be a near neighbor and constituent of mine; there is nothing local about her sympathy or her field of work or her reputation, and I trust the honorable Senator from Maryland will allow the Senate to deal with the bill.

We have, in addition to the statement of this lady, the statement of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], made on this floor yesterday, that he had personally visited the scene, if I understood him. What the Committee on Appropriations want more than the certificate of the Senator from South Carolina that he has personally visited the scene of suffering, I can

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, I think a bill of this character should be referred to a standing committee in accordance with the custom of the Senate. I am in full sympathy with the Senator from Massachusetts and should be delighted to relieve these people and all others who are suffering, whether from floods, cyclones, want of labor, or whatever it may be, but it appears to me—and I think that has been the almost universal custom of the Senate where we have made donations for the relief of distress in the past—that such bills should be referred to that this bill should go to the Committee on Appropriations. It is the only safe way to legislate on these matters.

We all feel as does the Senator from Massachusetts on this subject, and I appreciate his motives in coming here and asking for this relief. I have no doubt there is distress in the particular section referred to in the bill I also appreciate the earnestness of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina in front of me [Mr. Butler] in his appeal for these people. At the same time I think we had better act deliberately and only after consideration by a committee of the body, which is charged specially with looking to the total amount of appropriations by this Congress, which is becoming a matter of great concern to the people. I therefore insist on my motion.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, as I understand the pending bill, it asks for a very limited amount of money, an amount which can not embarrass the Government very seriously. Since I have been in the Senate there have been repeated appropriations of this character for the relief of people who have suffered from a great calamity, notably the sufferers from the overflow of the Ohio River and of the Mississippi River, for the relief of the sufferers from the epidemic in Florida a few years ago, and I think also in the case of Memphis. There can, therefore, be no reason in the precedents which have been established why this reason in the precedents which have been established why this appropriation should not be made.

According to my idea of the duty of Government and of its powers under our Constitution, wherever there is a great public calamity which is beyond the reach of private charity, it is a duty upon the part of the Government to extend its aid to the relief of its own people. This is, according to all the evidence which has been furnished to us, a calamity of that nature, from which many thousands of people are suffering, and it is within the power of the Government, and the Government alone, to furnish relief. It can be done consistently, with advantage to the public, and with the increase of the resources of the country in enabling these people to again resort to their agriculture and to become self-supporting and contribute something to the general wealth of the country.

wealth of the country.

But, Mr. President, beyond that, we are informed that there is a vast amount of suffering in the country for the want of employment; that this winter will see hundreds of thousands of people destitute of employment, and dangerous to the public peace and the public interest because of their enforced idleness.

I desire this appropriation to be made, and I want this Congress to remain here and consider measures which will afford relief to the hundreds of thousands of people who will be left without the means of subsistence this winter. I am in favor of the bill of the Senator from Massachusetts, and of its immediate consideration.

consideration.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have always been in favor of extending relief to the unfortunate to the full extent of the constitutional power of the United States. This bill provides for relieving the suffering from a cyclone, which was a force of nature, which deprived a few persons of their property and means of support; but when we enter upon this class of legislation we ought to reflect that there has recently been a legislative cyclone, which has been much more far-reaching in its effects, and has not only temporarily deprived a few people of employment and the means of livelihood, but has doomed to starvation and beggary millions of our fellow-citizens, who are to-day beginning for bread, and who in the coming winter must suffer untold misery. If this bill shall become a law, it will furnish a precedent for the appropriation of many millions of dollars if other cases equally worthy are to be provided for.

There are seven States and Territories in this Union which contain towns, villages, and hamlets where there is no employment, no means of obtaining bread and clothing, and the winter is approaching. The localities where that distress exists are in the mountains, far removed from the centers of civilization and far removed from benevolent societies which can afford relief; but Congress has been deaf to their appeals, and it is now proposed to extend charity to a few persons who are living where there are large communities and where aid can be readily extended.

Not only that, but there are thousands, perhaps hundreds of thousands, of workingmen who have been thrown out of employment throughout the land by reason of an inadequate supply of money to keep enterprise in progress. They will also put in a claim for relief during the coming winter. This ruin and distress does not stop with the miners and with the workmen, but it is rapidly extending to the farmers and producers, who, under the system of contraction ordained by the legislation of this session, will be reduced to such poverty that they will be unable to feed and educate their children.

I am not sorry that the Senator from Massachusetts by this bill has called to the attention of the Senate the suffering and distress in one quarter in order that some realizing sense may be had of the universal suffering which the legislation in these halls has inflicted upon the people of the United States.

The suffering people in this country do not expect any sympathy from the class who have obtained so much advantage by recent legislation. They know full well that the money-changers in the money centers care nothing for the producing classes, that their only anxiety is to obtain by strategy or by fraud or by any other means an unearned increment for themselves. They have been successful. We find, after twenty-five years of peace and abundant harvests, more suffering, more despair in this country than has existed in any period of our history. We know full well that it did not come from natural causes. We know full well that the owners of accumulated capital have revolutionized the financial system of the world, departed from the teachings of the fathers, and deprived the people of money with which to transact business and conduct enterprise, and that the policy which has wrought this evil is revolution—revolution of the financial system of the world. While that revolution is insisted upon, while the greed of avarice controls legislation and administration, there can be no hope of relief with the consent of the money power.

But I predict here and now that the people of the United States will assert their manhood and demand the restoration of the money of the Constitution and the independence of the coordinate departments of the Government; they will demand a legislative policy for this Government; they will demand that the people of this country shall dictate the policy to their chosen representatives, and that there shall be no interference with the legislative by the executive department. They will repudiate the Executive policy of this Government. The issue is broad; it is plain. The legislative power has been absorbed by the Executive. The command went forth, and the world understands that the Executive passed the law which you have recorded on the statute books, and not the legislative department. The legislative department was unable to cross a "t" or dot an "i." It was unable to compromise or to change the legislation which had been decreed by the Executive.

Executive policy and Executive control of the legislative func-

Executive policy and Executive control of the legislative functions of this Government, when in the interest of a moneyed class, is a menace to free government, is a menace to the liberties of the people which can not be tolerated. It has filled every house in the producing regions with gloom and despair. Millions to-day are starving for bread in this country of bounteous harvests, and the Executive tyranny, in carrying out the policy of the gold trust, is deaf to their complaint. The President is surrounded by influences hostile to the people, and is deaf to their growns of misery. They can not reach him.

their groans of misery. They can not reach him.

I am glad that this question of suffering and starvation is to be discussed. I hope the bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that they will consider to what extent it is possible for Congress to extend relief to the sufferers, who must starve during the coming winter, not on account of cyclones of nature, but on account of cyclones of legislation, dictated and carried through by speculative authority.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a question which appeals not alone to our sympathies, but to our humanity. I am told that 2,000 deaths have been occasioned by reason of this visitation of Providence on the coast of the Atlantic seaboard. I have been also shown a paper this morning from the State of Louisania, in which it is stated that 1,800 deaths have occurred there by reason of the same cyclone, that, in fact, there has been there a greater mortality and loss of life than has been occasioned by any battle in modern times.

Nearly 4,000 of these poor people have been deprived of their lives, but, in addition to that, here are their families left without the means of support, left homeless, their homes devastated and torn away, and they themselves left without food and without clothing, and the Legislatures of both those States not in session.

There is in those localities no organized element of the people which is able to afford the relief for which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts now asks. I see in a paper handed me by the Senator from Louisiana a statement of the organizations which have formed and of the amounts which have been sub-scribed and contributed by generous people, and it is said that the misery is still appalling; that it is impossible to get a suffi-cient amount of means to relieve the distress.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the Congress of the United States, considering its past record and history in these matters, would be culpable if it did not afford such relief to these distressed people as is needed. This is a subject which will not and can not wait; it is one which should not be postponed. Those people are in this suffering condition, and if the Congress of the United States, which has the power and the means to afford relief, does not come to their assistance, it is something which I think will plague and torment us in the future.

think will plague and torment us in the future.

I care not what may be the amount of money which the Congress of the United States must appropriate to pay its obligations, whether it be great or small in amount, surely in a case of this kind, where the appeal is made directly to the humanity of Congress, the people of this country will think very strangely of an act which sends this bill to a committee. I should infinitely prefer to see the bill amended by making a larger appropriation of money appears to sever the whole two towns one of the contract priation of money, enough to cover the whole territory over which the cyclone passed; but let it not be said that the Con-gress of the United States, at a time when such distress prevails amongst these people, when the Legislatures of the States are not in session, and when no organized element of the people is sufficient to meet the case by contributions, left those people to

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question, with his permission.

Mr. McPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Is the Senator willing to vote for some measure to relieve the distress of the people of the West whose callamity was produced by his own vote the other day?

Mr. McPHERSON. I am not aware, Mr. President, that I have cast any vote which has produced distress anywhere. If it shall appear that by any action of mine I have distressed any people in any part of this country, I shall make the most liberal contribution I can afford out of my own pocket to relieve them. In addition to that, I shall always vote for an appropriation by Congress to relieve the distresses of any people in the United States of America wherever they may be found.

These poor people are not responsible or to blame for what has overtaken them. Here is a cyclone passing over a section of country, which is perhaps least able to look after the distress occasioned by this visitation. If it had happened in the more northern parts of the country, where there are larger cities, and a larger number of people from whom to obtain contributions it larger number of people from whom to obtain contributions, it would rest entirely upon a different ground; but many of these people are helpless, entirely helpless; and shall it be said that the Congress of the United States, in the time of their great distress, has turned its face away from them because there was too little money in the Treasury of the United States to relieve them?

No, no, Mr. President, let it not be said that this Senate has taken any such course as that. Whether the bill be constitutional or unconstitutional it is something which appeals to our humanity. Certainly if the appropriation proposed is not a constitution. constitutional appropriation of money, it is one which the Congress of the United States has gone outside of the Constitution more than twenty times to make since I have been a member of this body, and I am willing to do it again. Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, there is another principle involved in the proposition before us besides the one of mere charity. I would not under any circumstances desire to be placed in the attitude of refusing to tender support where it is needed; but there is a great difference between paying out one's own money to the suffering poorand paying out the money of other men. The money which is in the Treasury, out of which we should be compelled to make this appropriation, belongs to the people of the United States; it is not ours, and we have no legal authority to use it for any purpose other than a public purpose. When-ever we depart from that line we are at sea, and there can be no

There are men and women in Florida, I am told, there are men and women in Louisiana, there are men and women even in my own State, if the dispatches published yesterday and this morning may be relied upon, and people in other portions of the country, who are in great trouble and want at this hour. Instead of the factories starting up, as we were advised they would do a few days ago, instead of the business of the country everywhere reviving and commerce taking on new life, we find that the reverse is being proved, that the predictions which the silver men, if I may so class them, made in the Senate are proved to be true

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas, with his leave, who made any such statement on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I do not feel like undertaking now to enumerate them all, for I might possibly make a mistake and put my finger on one or two who did not make such a statement. I do not know that the Senator from Massachusetts did, for the reason, I think greatly, that he did not take part in the discussion, except here and there to interject a question during that debate

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Kansas will pardon me, I made, early in the debate on the silver question, a careful, thorough, and elaborate speech, occupying a couple of hours, I think, to state my views on the question; and, so far as I know, with the exception of one or two Senators, every Senator who spoke in favor of repeal utterly and emphatically disclaimed at-tributing the present financial condition to the existence of the law which was sought to be repealed. There were two or three Senators of whom the Senator statement is true, and that is all.

Mr. PEFFER. I believe what the Senator from Massachusetts says in his last remark is true, that every Senator, with one or two exceptions-so far as I remember there was but one, and that was the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson]—disclaimed all belief, and all sympathy with the belief expressed in the message of the President, that the Sherman law had anything whatever to do with the bringing on of the troubles that confronted us. That was true. On the other hand, every Senator in favor of repeal, in order to be consistent with himself and with his new and changed position, was compelled to say that he believed that the repeal of the Sherman law would bring prosperity to the country.

I know that in several instances-I cannot locate them exactly just now, but other Senators perhaps can while I am talking Senators were distinct in their prediction that in a little while, as soon as the news was given to the country that the repeal bill had passed, commerce would revive and everything would revive again. I have not the words exactly as given, but substintially.

But, Mr. President, I was saying that while that prediction is not being fulfilled and, on the other hand, that our prediction is, the conditions of the country are going to grow worse and worse continually until we have changed our financial methods, revolutionized them completely, and adopted a new and better system. If that be the case, we are going to be besieged every day, and every week, and every month to afford relief to people in come part of the country. We cannot afford that relief adopted the some part of the country. We cannot afford that relief adequately, except upon altogether a different plan, and it is that plan to which I have risen to call the attention of the Senate.

We can lawfully put men who are out of employment to work.

The Government has authority to construct public buildings, the Government has authority to construct railways, to build ships, to bring water upon arid lands, to open waterways, to clean out harbors, to do a thousand and one different things that clean out harbors, to do a thousand and one different things that the people of the country need to have done. If the Senator from Massachusetts will introduce a bill here, designate some species of public employment at which these people may be properly set to work, I shall cheerfully support it, and vote for an appropriation to employ the people; but to donate money to persons, to give it out of the public Treasury, is altogether another thing. other thing

I believe in the doctrine of the Government employing people who are out of work, and I expect before I conclude my term of service in this body to bring that subject before the attention of the Senate and of the country, by way of constructing new freight railway lines, by opening water channels, by straightening, or, at least, to a large extent, straightening the Mississippi River by opening other outlets so as to avoid the trouble coming from the overflow, and to build railway lines upon either side of the river in order that, while we are protecting the roadbed of the line, we are also protecting the people from the ravages of the river—these and other things. I mention them merely in this broken way for the purpose of calling attention to the great fact that the Government has the authority to employ men in that way, or in some such way, but in posterior.

way, or in some such way, but in no other.

Mr. President, we have no right whatever to appropriate public funds for private uses. That is the principle involved in the pending bill. I hope the bill will be referred to the Committee pending bill. on Appropriations, that the committee will give it great care and great consideration, and that in their report, when they do report, they will give us something substantial upon which to act.

Mr. CAFFERY. Mr. President, I quite agree with the view expressed by the distinguished Senator from Mussachusetts [Mr.
HOAR] that the Senate itself, without the intervention of a committee, should examine into the necessity of governmental aid in cases of great public calamity. My own State has been the re-cipient of governmental bounty, and it does not lie in the mouths of its Senators to put any kind of obstruction in the way of aid to

My own State has lately been visited by a hurricane of unprecedented severity. Two thousand and eight persons actually lost their lives by that calamity, and the survivors in the stricken district are absolutely bereft of the means of livelihood. Whilst my State has not made any denur depend on the Carnett Carnett. my State has not made any demand upon the General Government for aid, it is appropriately and properly a case where governmental aid should be extended.

The cyclone which visited the coast of the Carolinas, in behalf of whose sufferers the pending bill has been introduced, was one of unprecedented severity. The people living upon the sea coast of the Southern States, except in large planting districts, are generally poor. The storm not only destroyed life, but it destroyed the means of livelihood to the survivors. I mean to say that a matter of this kind, which appeals to the humanity of the whole of the United States, ought to be passed upon in the Senate without the interposition of a committee.

At the proper time my colleague [Mr. White of Louisiana] will prepare an amendment to this bill in behalf of the sufferers

Mr. CALL. Does not the pending bill apply to Louisiana? Mr. CAFFERY. I think not. I ask the Senator from Massachusets whether the pending bill is for any other than the sufferers from the Carolina cyclone?

Mr. HOAR. The appeal comes from the Carolinas, from Georgia, and the mainland near the sea islands.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why not make an appropriation, say, of $100,000, to be applied to all the localities which have suffered from the ovelence.

from the cyclone?

Mr. HOAR. I am myself very willing to do that, if any Senator thinks that is well.

Mr. CAFFERY. I will state that I have personal knowledge of the locality visited by the cyclone in Louisiana. It is a low-lying country-Mr. HOAR. If the motion for the reference of the pending bill be voted down, I shall accept any amendment which the Senator from Louisiana may propose, supported by a statement like that he is now making on his personal knowledge, as the provisions of the bill as they stand have been supported by the personal authority of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. CAFFERY. I have not visited the scene of the disaster, but I know the locality so well, that taking the newspaper reports, the authentic reports of the disaster, I can very well gauge the calamity. Mr. HOAR. I should be very willing to accept the Senator's assurance.

Mr. CAFFERY. Those people are mostly fishermen, engaged in the oyster and fishing business. The loss of life was appalling, extending into the thousands. Their water craft, their fish nets, and all the appliances they have with which to make a living were destroyed; and although in that State there has been organized charity in behalf of these sufferers, yet there remains a great deal of distress. The Legislature is not in session, and, therefore, no appropriation can be made by that body. Though the acutest suffering has been assuaged by the gratuities Though the acutest suffering has been assuaged by the gratuities and gifts of benevolent individuals through organized charities, yet a great deal remains to be done, and a great deal of suffering appeals to the common humanity of the whole United States for relief.

for relief.

I shall be very glad to see the Senate take cognizance of this matter without the intervention of a committee.

Mr. GRAY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 3687, the Chinese bill, so called.

Mr. HOAR. I hope we shall first get some disposition of the other bill which has been pending.

Mr. GRAY. If there can be a vote on it, I am willing to yield.

Mr. GORMAN. Let us vote on the motion to refer.

Mr. GRAY. I yield simply for a vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Delaware to withdraw his motion. The question, then, tor from Delaware to withdrawhis motion. The question, then, is on the motion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], to refer the bill which has been pending to the Committee on Appropriations. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to

Mr. HOAR. I call for a division.

The question being put, the ayes were 12.

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from Massachusetts will not ask for any further count.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the demand for a division will be withdrawn. It is evident what the result will be if it is persisted in. In that case I doubt much whether we could even act upon the resolution for final adjournment.

Mr. HOAR. I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. ALLEN, I desire to suggest the want of a quorum at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.
Mr. ALLEN. On the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] I withdraw the call.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The call is withdrawn.
Mr. DOLPH. I rise to a parliamentary drugiry. Can a suggestion of the want of a quorum has withdrawn?

gestion of the want of a quorum be withdrawn?

Mr. GORMAN and others. Oh, yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the call can be withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he do not insist on a division.

Mr. HOAR. It strikes me that it is a little hard that all the instrumentalities and ingenuities of parliamentary law should be directed against the poor people to whom the bill in my charge applies, that the Senate can not have a vote on it, and that we are asked to go on without a quorum, and to act in regard to mitters of the greatest importance. I think it is pretty hard, and this is the first time in the history of the Senate, within my recollection, when the question of the reading of a bill on three separate days has been raised.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have myself raised it on several occa-

Mr. HOAR. I do not remember any other case. It is very well known to many members of the Senate that it is a rule seldom, if ever, invoked. I speak with the profoundest respect to the Senator who insists on the application of the rule; but why we should be appealed to to give up everything we think ought to be done, and allow the Senate, with much less than a quorum, to pass upon the important matter which will soon come before the Senate, which is a new aggravation concerning our relations with a foreign government, and against the opinions of many of us, I do not think is quite fair.

If Senators are willing to allow this measure to go over until a later hour, if a majority of Senators present are willing to do that, without raising a parliamentary objection and sending it to the Committee on Appropriations, who will not deal with it in time, of course I shall not object. I do not want to force the opinion of a minority upon the majority. If there be a majority of the Senate who think that the bill which I have introduced is improper legislation, let them say so, and I shall acquiesce; but I shall not acquiesce to have these parliamentary weapons sharply cut the thread of this measure, and stand by and say, "Oh, well; a half dozen Senators may deal with important legislation on any other measure which they desire to pass." To that I am opposed. You may have your rules about dealing with a question of a quorum and go clear down, and I will agree to it; draw your own rule so that it shall be applied to measures which Senators may bring up during the rest of this session, and I will be bound by it; but I do not want one rule applied to me and another rule applied to everybody else.

I think my friend from Maryland, who is the soul of justice in dealing with such things as this, will admit that I am right.

Mr. GORMAN. I wish to assure the Senator from Massachusetts that I have no desire in the world on this or any other matters. If Senators are willing to allow this measure to go over until setts that I have no desire in the world on this or any other matter of logislation to violate the rule, or to postpone the consideration of the Senator's bill; but I should feel compelled to make the motion I have made in this case with regard to any appropriation which came along in the closing hours of the session. Measures of this kind ought not to be rushed through. Of course we are appealed to constantly on all sides to make these appropriations. I confess that I have voted for them. There are particular cases which have come up where it would have been impossible for me to have voted against them.

I wish to say to my distinguished friend from New Jersey [Mr. MoPHERSON] that, as a rule, I think it is bad policy on the part of Congress to make appropriations for suffering in any locality. We have seen in our country, and all over the world, in the last three years an epidemic which has been more fatal than any which has ever been known to mankind. Thousands of people in this country have died and become disabled from la grippe. We have seen epidemics of yellow fever, and it has been now raging in one section of the country during the presbeen now raging in one section of the country during the present season. Appeals have constantly come to us from such localities. I should like very much to be able to respond to them. I (sel about the matter as kindly as the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Massachusetts do, and in extreme sey and the Senator From Massachusetts do, and in extreme cases, as I have said, I have voted for appropriations. But I never voted, so far as I can remember, for a bill or resolution of that kind, which had not gone to a committee of this body and been considered, and well considered by it.

and been considered, and well considered by it.

Mr. HOAR. May I interrupt the Senator from Maryland one moment, not to interfere with what he is saying?

Mr. GORMAN. I yield to the Senator with great pleasure.
Mr. HOAR. I am aware that at 2 o'clock, now two minutes hence, the morning hour will end, and the bill of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] will come up as a matter of right. I shall make no objection to its being considered at 2 o'clock.

Mr. GORMAN. I have only to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I am perfectly content that the sense of the Senate shall be taken on his bill as well as the other, when we shall be in a condition to do so, as I think we shall be a little later in the

Mr. HOAR. That is all I desire.

Mr. GORMAN. But I say to the Senator that the vote can not be taken upon it now. I am content, however, that during the day the sense of the Senate shall be taken on the Senator's bill.

Mr. HOAR. If the sense of the Senate can be taken on the measure I shall be entirely satisfied.

Mr. GORMAN. The vote can be taken on the reference of the bill to the Committee of Appropriations, which will be a test

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated. The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution authorizing the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 3d day of November, present, at 3 o'clock p. m.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 3545) to amend section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to mining claims; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-Pres-

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 3d day of November, present, at 3 o'clock p. m.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair inquires what disposition the Senate desires to make of the resolution?

Mr. GORMAN. I suggest that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that reference will be made.

W. H. WARD.

Mr. KYLE. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 45) for the relief of W. H. Ward, to which I am sure there will be no objection whatever, and which will occasion no debate

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 45) for the relief of W. H. Ward. The preamble recites that an act of Congress approved March 3, 1883, referred to the Court of Claims the petition and claims of William Henry Ward (formerly of Auburn, N. Y., and also of Monongahela City, Pa., but now of Alexandria, Va.), against the United States for a shell molding machine, and also for the intringement and use of his bullet week in a state of the interpretation. fringement and use of his bullet machine patents. It is objected that two of the claims are debarred judicial consideration in consequence of existing statutes, therefore the bill proposes to empower the Court of Claims to examine all the claims of W. H. Ward set forth in his petition, notwithstanding the sections of the Revised Statutes referred to in the preamble, and when the facts have been found by the court, to render such judgment thereon as law and equity warrant, without reference to the statutes of limitation or other acts or statutes to the contrary.

Mr. DOLPH. From what committee is the bill reported?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. From the Committee on Patents.

Mr. KYLE. I will state to the Senator from Oregon that the bill merely proposes to send the claim to the Court of Claims.

Mr. PLATT. The bill has been passed two or three times heretofore by the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

COURTS IN IDAHO AND WYOMING.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time the bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892. It will not take more than two or three minutes.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Sen te without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask unamimous consent to report from the Committee on Printing with amendments the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives with reference to the distribution of the Congressional Record. I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be directed to turnish to each Representative and Delegate 22 additional copies of the Congressional Records, of which number 8 copies shall be sent. I each to su in public or school libraries as shall be designated by each Representative and Delegate.

That the remainder of this number, 14 copies, he shall furnish to each Representative and Delegate during the extraordinary session of the Fifty-third Congress.

third Congress.

The amendments of the Committee on Printing were, in line 4, after the word "Delegate," to strike out "twenty-two" and insert "fifteen;" and after the word "RECORD," in line 5, to strike out all down to and including the word "extraordinary," in the last line, and to insert "during the first;" so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be directed to furnish to each Representative and Delegate is additional copies of the Congressional Record during the first session of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. GORMAN. The object of this resolution is to give to the members of the other House the same number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that Senators receive, 37 in all. A proposed to be amended it applies only to the present session.

The amendments were agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. The message also announced that the House had passed the

CHINESE EXCLUSION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SQUIRE.

the amendment of Mr. SQUIRE.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I submitted yesterday an amendment to the pending bill. With a desire to perfect the amendment I send to the desk a supplement to that amendment, which

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Add to the amendment of Mr. DAVIS: That that certain act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese, approved May 6, 1882, "approved July 5, 1884, be, and the same is hereby, reënacted, and that such act thus reënacted shall continue in force until the expiration of ten years after the passage of this act.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, it is certainly unfortunate for every interest involved in the pending bill that its final consider-ation or even its discussion should be pressed at the present time. It is perfectly manifest that full discussion can not now be had It is very doubtful whether it can be passed in the pres ent state of the attendance of the Senate. It is a momentous and far-reaching measure, one which has appealed to the conscience of the country and excited everywhere a great deal of comment.

We have just passed through a long and strenuous debate upon one single subject. We have enacted the most important financial legislation that Congress has ever passed. The public mind and the minds of Senators have been strained under the tension of this extraordinary session. Both sides of the gold and silver shield have been repeatedly struck by champions here and elsewhere, and the country has resounded with the clangor. We are approaching the end of the session. The time of adjournment is fixed, and I repeat, that to bring forward a measure of this importance, involving public duty and personal right to the extent that it does, is most unfortunate, because it can not result in adequate debate or full deliberation.

Mr. President, our relations with the Empire of China have for many years been of the most perplexing character. The treaty commonly known as the Burlingame treaty, negotiated in 1868, was concluded at a time in our history when the American can people had the most effusive ideas in regard to the equality of individuals and the parity of the personal elements of which nations are composed. We were then going through the experiment of adopting the constitutional amendments whereby we introduced as an operative factor into our body politic a race generically different from our own; and we are now endeavoring to adjust that experiment to existing and permanent conditions.

The Burlingame treaty was considered to be a great act of diplomacy. It was thought that it would be followed by consequences of wide philanthropy and universal brotherhood. Its immediate results were, no doubt, most beneficial to the Pacific States. A new influx of laborers poured the efforts of their industry into every situation demanding employment. They built the Central Pacific Railroad. They opened in California its fields of wheat, its orchards and vineyards. But time went on and it was discovered (and nobody I know of entirely dissents from this view) that probably the whole experiment was of an undesirable and doubtful character.

Mr. President, I do not wish to be for a moment misapprehended in regard to my own position, if that is of any importance to anybody but myself. I am as much opposed as my friend from California [Mr. Perkins] to the immigration of Chinese labor-I do not want to see this element grow in our country. wish to see it steadily diminished in efficacy and in numbers until it shall cease to exist. But what I object to, and concerning which I have the clearest convictions of my duty, is the manner in which it is proposed to depopulate the country of those peo-

As I have said, the Burlingame treaty became unsatisfactory: and it was proposed about the year 1880 by this Government that and it was proposed about the year 1880 by this Government that the vast and generous terms of that convention, by which Chinese were permitted to come to this country ad libitum, should be modified by treaty stipulations of a new and restricted character. Accordingly the treaty of 1880 was concluded between the two governments, which in substance provided (I shall not attempt to state statutes or treaties literally) that whenever in the opinion of the United States injurious effects are threatened or caused by the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, or their residence therein such coming or residence may be required. their residence therein, such coming or residence may be regulated, limited, or suspended, but not absolutely prohibited; that the limitation or suspension shall be reasonable and shall apply only to laborers, and immigrants shall not be subject to personal

That is the essence of that treaty so far maltreatment or abuse. as the immigration of laborers is concerned.

Within four years after its ratification, and in the due course of legislation two acts of Congress were passed, the act of 1882 and the act of 1884, designed to carry into effect the stipulation of the convention to which I have just alluded. Without going into that legislation with any degree of particularity (for, as I have said, it is not my purpose to do so at any stage of this discussion) it must be sufficient to say that those statutes, by an elaborate system of registration and certificates, plainly sufficient, I think, and certainly sufficient when supplemented by such regulations as the Treasury Department had full authority to make, were adequate to carry out the treaty stipulations and to prevent the evil which was to be apprehended. But that, Mr. President, was not deemed sufficient. Other treaty stipulations were demanded on the part of our Government. Accordingly in the year 1888 another convention still more retaking was concluded between the Empire of China and the United States. In anticipation of the ratification of that treaty the act of September 13, 1888, was passed by Congress, concerning which it is sufficient to say that substantially the terms of that treaty were written into the act for the purpose of making it efficacious and operative. But while this was being done we were on the eve of another Presidential election, and that conscienceless party spirit, concerning which neither the Democratic nor the Republican party has any particular right to re-proach the other, was put at work to bid for political support in the Pacific States.

Accordingly, early in October, 1888, what is commonly known as the Scott bill was passed, by which, in abrogation of the terms of the treaty of 1880, the right of the Chinese to come into this country was very much limited, and certificates, some twenty country was very much limited, and certificates, some twenty thousand in number, I have been told, which were outstanding under the operations of the treaty of 1880 and the act of 1882 and the act of 1884, held by thousands of people who had gone to China under the sanctity of that legislation and that treaty, were absolutely canceled and nullified. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations wrote the words of the Scott act into the treaty, when it had it under consideration and added to the treaty which had been negotiated those stringent and violative provisions, and in that shape it was advised and consented to by the Senate. Those modifications were telegraphed to China, where the convention was being considered; the treaty broke down, and it never has been heard of since.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggest tion? I do not think the amendments made by the Senate in the treaty of 1888 were at all material or that China ever signified that they would not be satisfactory to the Chinese Government. They were satisfactory to the Chinese minister here as a matter of fact. I do not understand that the treaty of 1888 was ever rejected by the Chinese Government. It had not been acted upon at the time the Scott act was passed, and of course it would not be acted upon after the passage of that act. The act of September 13, 1888, was to take effect only when the Chinese Government ratified the treaty of 1888, but before the Chinese Government had acted upon it, or our Government was notified that they had rejected or disapproved or refused to ratify the treaty, the Scott act approved October 1, 1888, was passed, and of course after that the treaty fell; but I think it failed on account of the Scott act, and not on account of any obnoxious provisions added to the treaty of 1888.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I think I speak advisedly upon this subject. A large part of the information from which I have spoken as to the fate of the negotiations of 1888 was derived from some remarks made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Morgan], now chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in 1892, in this body, when the act of 1892 was under consideration.

Mr. DOLPH. It is a fact nevertheless.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg not to be interrupted. My view is entirely immaterial to the line of my thought and discussion.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well

Mr. DAVIS. In that state of things, another Presidential canvass supervening, the act of 1892 was passed, of which, or of some portions of which, the pending measure is an amendment. Now, distinctly stating my position in this matter, it is this, and such are the object and scope of the amendments I have sent to the desk; I am in favor of carrying out the provisions of the treaty of 1880. I wish to restore to operation the act of 1884, amendatory of the act of 1882, and I am opposed, upon what I conceive to be the highest considerations, to any of the legislation which has been enacted since that time and which is now oper-I am especially opposed to the act of 1892, the amendment to which is now before us for consideration, and it is that act and its practical operations to which I intend to direct the greater portion of my remarks.

Up to a certain time, namely, up to the time when the obnoxlous legislation to which I have alluded became operative, the policy of this country through its statutes in the execution of the treaty was to regulate, control, and prevent the coming into this country of those Chinese who were not entitled to come; but, in abrogation of the treaty, in amendment and repeal of those statutes enacted to carry it out, that purpose has been enlarged, so that, say what you may of the devices and pretexts and glosses to which this legislation has been subjected, the actual object is to drive from this country by a system of legislation, which is the scandal and disgrace of our time, those who came here by our invitation, and whose right to remain here is guaranteed not only by treaty obligations, but by statutes efficacious and in force up to a recent time.

The act of 1892, the most stringent and the most advanced legislation to that end, and which I shall analyze at some length hereafter, with all of its prohibitory and severe provisions, its processes without law, its total disregard of personal security, liberty, or right, has been declared to be constitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States. Against that decision I have no argument to make. It is the declared and established law. I shall not be led to discuss its soundness, for no discussion here can impair its validity. It is declarative of the powers of this Government in a field in which it has not trodden for nearly one hundred years. I may be permitted to say that the decision of the court took the great majority of the profession of this country, so far as I can learn, by surprise.

But, Mr. President, the decision of the Supreme Court of the

But, Mr. President, the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States simply declares the law and the limitations of the Constitution. It says what may or may not be done. That tribunal outlines no policy, and its conclusion upon the validity of a statute is not even a monition to Congress as to the proper method of exercising its political and administrative powers within their unquestioned limits. That court has decided that there resides in the other departments of the Government a power vast, ill defined, susceptible of abuse, liable to be perverted to purposes of passion. For that very reason I call for a revision of the statutes by which that political and administrative power has been put into operation.

The Supreme Court of the United States in substance has de-

The Supreme Court of the United States in substance has decided that, so far as the Chinese in this country are concerned, the question of their disposition, remaining here, deportation, exile, banishment, punishment, whatever you may call it, is entirely and exclusively a matter of political administration; that nosanction of personal right—such personal rights as are enjoyed by us—can be invoked by them in the courts for their protection.

Formerly there was a vague and general idea concerning the execution of this law, that somewhere, somehow, by certiorari, writ of error, habeas corpus, or in some way, rights abused, or rights misused, or wrongs perpetrated, could be rectified by the courts in proceedings under this statute. But that is not to be. Hence, since the judiciary has closed its doors to this class of people, especially to those who have been invited to come here and are in this country under the charter and letters-patent of a treaty of the United States with their Government, if we wish to get rid of them by administrative and executive procedure we should do it by methods warranted by humanity, and the more so because the power which has been vested in the political department of this Government is so irresponsible and uncontrollable.

I wish to call attention to the provisions of the act of May 5, 1892, and of the amendment now pending to that act for the purpose of emphasizing in a more particular way the objections which I think are valid against the expediency of this legislalation. My objections, in my opinion, are stronger for the simple reason that the political powers granted by the statute have been decided to be absolutely uncontrollable by the judiciary, and are vested entirely in the unregulated discretion of the executive officers of the Government. Take the second section of the act of 1892:

That any Chinese person or person of Chinese descent, when convicted and adjudged under any of said laws to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States, shall be removed from the United States to China—

"When convicted or adjudged." Note the judicial phraseology as to matters which have been held not to be judicial—unless he or they shall make it appear to the justice, judge, or commis-unless he or they shall make it appear to the justice, judge, or commissioner before whom he or they are tried that he or they are subjects or citizens of some other country, in which case he or they shall be removed from the United States to such country.

Here is a man brought before a judge, magistrate, or commissioner. He is charged with the offense of being unlawfully in this country. Every presumption with which the common law surrounds an accused person, that he is innocent until he is proven guilty, is studiously by statute taken away. He-must make it appear to the magistrate that he is a citizen of another country, in which case he shall be deported to that country. Then notice what follows:

Provided, That in any case where such other country of which such Chinese person shall claim to be a citizen or subject shall demand any tax as a condition of the removal of such person to that country, he or she shall be removed to China.

Now, I have to say generally in respect to that proviso that we have undertaken to deport Chinese to other countries than China, with which we have treaty stipulations, giving to their citizens the right to come and go and live here upon the same terms that we have given the most favored nation. In case a Chinese happens to be a citizen of another country than China, we have undertaken to deport him to that country of which he may claim and prove himself to be a citizen. In the anxiety to get rid of these people the framers of the legislation of 1892, while they repudinted our treaty obligations with China, were not careful of our obligations to other countries. Absolute is the provision that when the Chinese is convicted and adjudged to be unlawfully here, when by treaty with Great Britain he had a right to be here, if he was a subject of that country, he shall be deported to Great Britain, or such other country of which he may be a subject, raising at once questions between us and other nations with whom we have no interest or desire to be entangled in any such controversy.

But the proviso adds an iniquity to that to which I have just called the attention of the Senate. It provides in substance that if the other country of which the Chinese has established himself to be a citizen lays any tax or head money upon him, he shall be deported—where? Not to the country to which he owes allegiance, but he shall be deported to China, a realm which he has abjured; that he shall be banished to the country from which he originally came. What will be the effect? Great Britain acquired Hongkong in 1841. It is an island off the coast of China, and contains about 25 square miles. It has about 220,000 people. Every Chinese born in Hongkong since the acquisition of that island by the British Government is a subject of Great Britain, and it is said (I know not with how much accuracy, though to a certain degree it must be true) that a large part of the Chinese immigration to the United States has come from Hongkong, so that in this respect we deal, or propose to deal, not only with the Empire of China, but with Great Britain or other countries with whom Chinese may have, and doubtless have, assumed the relations of citizenship.

Passing on to section 3:

That any Chinese person or person of Chinese descent arrested under the provision of this act or the acts hereby extended shall be adjudged—

Note the judicial phraseology-to be unlawfully within the United States, unless such person shall establish, by affirmative proof, to the satisfaction of such justice, judge, or commissioner, his lawful right to remain in the United States.

Now, that measure of proof applies not only to deportation proceedings but to criminal proceedings, strictly defined to be such in the body of the act, whereby sentence is to follow judicial proceedings. Whoever heard, whoever saw, in any other legislation than this, that a man accused of that which is in substance a crime, of which he must be convicted by some process or other, shall be adjudged guilty unless he shall affirmatively prove by a prependerance of testimony sufficient to remove the legal presumption of guilt, that he is an innocent man? There is no such law elsewhere in Christendom, and it would disgrace Morocco.

SEC. 4. That any such Chinese person or person of Chinese descent convicted and adjudged to be not lawfully entitled to be or remain in the United States shall be imprisoned at hard labor for a period of not exceeding one year and thereafter removed from the United States, as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. WHITE of California. The Senator is aware, I presume, that that section has been declared invalid. That section has been eliminated from the act.

Mr. DAVIS. I am carrying out my argument to show the animus of this legislation. The animus with which the act was drawn was that under section 3, when a Chinese person was accused he must prove his innocence, and if he did not prove it he should be imprisoned for one year at hard labor and afterwards be deported to the place from whence he came.

be deported to the place from whence he came.

Mr. DOLPH. Imprisoned not exceeding one year. He might not be imprisoned for an hour.

Mr. DAVIS. Not exceeding one year. Section 5 provides:

That after the passage of this act, on an application to any judge or court of the United States in the first instance for a writ of habeas corpus, by a Chinese person seeking to land in the United States, to whom that privilege has been denied, no ball shall be allowed, and such application shall be heard and determined promptly without unnecessary delay.

Mr. President, we have all been brought up to consider, whether as to ourselves to the manner born, or as to aliens or denizens, that the great shield of the writ of habeas corpus was always over all. So dear is personal liberty in our political conceptions that the distinction of the right to that writ had never been drawn as against an alien prior to this legislation. Here he is seized, arrested, detained.

Mr. DOLPH. No; that is while still aboard ship.

Mr. DAVIS. While still aboard ship, but he is detained there; he can not get off; he is restrained of the liberty of his person; he can not have the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, even to enable him to go ashore and prepare for his defense. But what is the use of particularizing and stigmatizing in detail a deprivation by a statute of rights so comprehensive and disgraceful

I now come to an examination of section 6, and the proposed amendment under present consideration, which mainly is con-cerned with the substantial reënactment (with some few immaterial variations) of section 6 of the act of 1892. Bear in mind that the treaty of 1880 had provided that certain laborers who were here at a certain time should be permitted to remain in this country; that its whole scope, and all that was asked then, was to restrict the further indux of immigrants of that character. Bearing all that in mind, let us consider the provision of the proposed amendment. It is nearly identical with section 6 in the statute of 1892:

SEC. 6. And it shall be the duty of all Chinese laborers within the limits of the United States, at the time of the passage of this act, and who were en-titled to remain in the United States—

Mr. PLATT. Who are entitled to remain?
Mr. DAVIS. "Who were entitled to remain in the United States" before the passage of the act to which this is an amend-

Mr. PLATT. Who does the Senator understand were entitled to remain:

Mr. DAVIS. That enters into a branch of detail I do not care to be questioned about just now, but I merely ask the attention of the Senate to the general fact that unblushingly and avowedly the act proposes to proceed against people who up to a certain time were entitled to remain within this country. It shall be the duty of such Chinese laborers "to apply to the collector of internal revenue of their respective districts, within six months after the passage of this act, for a certificate of residence."

His duty is to apply to the collector. I pause to remark, in criticism of that particular provision, that nowhere within the compass of this amendment, or of any legislation of which it is amendatory, is it made the duty of the collector to give the Chinese person a certificate. At the very beginning of this proceeding an inferior executive officer of the United States is to be applied to. His discretion merely is to be applied to? His judgment is final. There is no appeal in case of his refusal to grant a certificate, however the Chinese may be prepared to show clearly his right to be here; and with the state of feeling in those parts of the country which assert themselves to be most deeply affected and injured by the presence of this population, I ask, taking into account the average performances of human nature, what kind of a show the Chinese is going to have with the collector to whom he applies? Suppose he does apply. "I will not grant your certificate." Then he passes, abandoning all hope under all of the penal provisions of the law, and can not possibly reinstate himself.

Mr. GRAY. I ask the Senator from Minnesota, if he will permit me, whether, notwithstanding the looseness of the framing of the original Ge ry act, so-called, he does not think that there is an implication of duty arising from the structure of the section upon the co lector to give the certificate when it is applied for?

Mr. DAVIS. It is enough for my purpose to say that I do not believe such a discretion ought to be confided to the collector. Mr. GRAY. I do not think so either. I only ask the Senator if he does not think there is an implication of duty.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly my esteemed friend thinks so; but what I am talking about is the logical consequence. Supposing the implied duty of which the Senator speaks and which may exist here is not performed, where is the remedy for the Chinese, however clear his claim may be?

Mr. GRAV. There is a remedy of mandamus. I should think

Mr. GRAY. There is a remedy of mandamus, I should think, where there is a duty implied.

Mr. DAVIS. I am talking about the practical working of this business. Mandamus can not control or overrule the exercise of discretionary power by any public officer. I am trying to convince the Senate that this is a matter which ought not to be precipitately or inconsiderately decided; and that this whole ques ion ought to be again referred to the Committee on For-eign Relations with a view that some legislation adequate to the subject, and at the same time just, can be formulated—and any Chinese laborer, within the limits of the United States, who shall neglect fail, or refuse to comply with the provisions of this act and the act to which this is an amendment, or who, after the expiration of said six months, shall be found within the jurisdiction of the United States without such certificate of residence, shall be deemed and adjudged—

Note the judicial and forensic language again-to be unlawfully within the United States, and may be arrested by any United States customs official—ctor of internal revenue or his deputies, United States marshal or his Consider for a moment, Mr. President, such legislation as this, applicable to 106,000 people, in the enjoyment of the right to personal liberty and domicile in the midst of a hostile race, by as solemn a tre ity as this Government ever concluded, by which as solemn a treaty as this Government ever concluded, by which they are turned over to be taken bodily in a mun-hunt by any one of the officers or their numerous deputies, of the character described in the sentence which I have just read. What a source of abuse! What a weapon of violence! What an instrument of extortion and oppression and bribery!

Any wandering deputy marshal, or collector, or anybody who can be called an official in the United States customs department anywhere in this country can lay his hand upon a human can be called an ordered in the Critical States customs department anywhere in this country, can lay his hand upon a human being without a warrant or precept. No court surpervises him, no controlling authority holds the reins over him. It is a matter entirely between the man-hunter and his victim. If he lets him go for a consideration there is nobody in particular to call him to account.

This, be it ever remembered, is not a judicial proceeding. This is the exercise of political power, and to exercise this political power we propose to vest in a body of people in no way connected with the courts (at least two-thirds of them are not), a power which if it were invoked in Great Britain to-day in regard to any person, subject, or denizen, within the island, would shake the foundation of that Government so that it would topple to its

When people are to be deprived of their liberty, when they are to be detained, when they are to be convicted, when they are to suffer the extreme punishment of banishment, and that through the action of a judge, as in this case, although he acts not judicially but politically, all experience shows, and all civilized legislation provides, that to authorize one man to arrest another he ought to have a warrant for that arrest and detention. other he ought to have a warrant for that arrest and detention. It is under the seal of the court. The hand of the court is upon its officer. He must produce his man before the judge, or magistra e, or court which issues the warrant. For any irregularity in the arrest the prisoner can make complaint. But here is no warrant at a.l. The mere fact that a man is a Chin se authorizes any one of these deputies or officials to demand his certificate, and if he does not immediately show it, to lay hands upon him and dispose of him in the manner which I shall indicate.

Mr. PALMER. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow me to supplement his remark? It is not necessary that the man should even be a Chinese. It would be quite sufficient that these to supplement his remark? It is not necessary that the man should even be a Chinese. It would be quite sufficient that these irresponsible officers supposed him to be one.

Mr. DAVIS. That is probably true.

Mr. WHITE of California. Would the judge deport him then?

Mr. DAVIS. Now, after the kidnaping proceeding this follows: The apprehended man isto be taken before a United States judge What judge? Where? Of the district where the man is seized? Naturally so, but the statute does not say so. A Chinese person seized in Oregon can be taken to California and vice versa, or he can be taken to the city of New York-nose duty it shall be to order that he be deported from the United States provided in this act and in the act to which this is an amendment, unless shall establish clearly—

Note the burden of proof—to the satisfaction of said judge, that by reason of accident, si-kness, or other unavoidable cause, he has been unable to procure his certificate, and to the satisfaction of said United States judge, and by at least one credible witness other than Chinese, that he was a resident of the United States on the 5th of May, 1992.

I was very much pleased to hear the criticisms of the venerable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Palmer] on this subject.

Section 6 of the act of 1892 provides that there should be "one credible white witness." The thing has been transformed but has not been materially changed in the eye of justice in the amendment which I hold in my hand. He must establish it—

By at least one credible witness other than Chinese

Little by little all civilized nations have adopted an axiomatic law of evidence that the testimony of any man can be heard when it is given under the sanctions and ceremonies of his religion, or upon his conscience if he has no religious belief respecting the sanctity of an oath. All experience, all philo-sophic jurisprudence here where the common law obtains, and sophic jurisprudence here where the common law obtains, and elsewhere in countries where the civil law prevails, has settled down upon the conclusion that the objections to a witness go only to his credibility. All systems of law will hear his story; will weigh the facts and circumst inces; will confront him with other witnesses; will measure his story by other competent evidence. But under this statute the Chinese can not be heard for the purpose of establishing his most inestimable rights. He can not establish by the testimeny of one Chinese witness, or ten or twenty Chinese witnesses, that he has complied or is entitled to comply with the provisions of this law.

Now, it may be, it naturally would be among this peculiar people, that the only sources of proof which must thus be furnished clearly to the satisfaction of the judge are among their own people. They are not to be heard for the purpose of plenary proof, or heard at all. The accused may have drifted to New York or to St. Paul, having a companion there who has known him, when there is not a white man within 2,000 or 4,000 miles who could give the least attestation concerning him.

could give the least attestation concerning him.

He is seized in New York or in St. Paul; he is taken before a United States judge, brought there without a warrant, by an underling without any authority except his official connection with another department than that concerned in the administration of justice; and in such case as that which I have supposed the Chinese is utterly remediless by the simple automatic operation of a law, and he immediately goes under the yoke of the penal provisions of this statute.

and if upon the hearing it shall appear that he is so entitled to a certifi-cate it shall be granted upon his paying the cost.

That is a touch of meanness which speaks for itself,

Should it appear that said Chinaman had procured a certificate, which has been lost or destroyed—

Mr. PLATT. What cost?
Mr. DAVIS. It does not say what cost. The question forcibly illustrates the powers of oppression of which this act is suscep-

Now, about this Chinese testimony, which I was about to depart from without suggesting another consideration which had occurred to me. Here is a Chinese person before a judge, deprived perchance of the only testimony by which he can establish his right. The scene is a United States court room. The right. proceedings of a criminal trial are suspended for a moment to enable the judge to cease to be a judge and to perform this act of political administration. It is over. The trial of a person, white man or Chinese, accused of felony gainst a law of the United States is resumed, and this same Chinese, whose testimony and the bystanders of his nationality whose testimony has been rejected by the judge in his capacity of a political administrator by the force of this statute, happen to know all about the crime of the culprit who is upon trial. The United States law puts these same Chinese witnesses into the box to prove the allegation of an indictment in a trial against a white man. The testimony is received, and if it is credible, conviction and sentence of imprisonment, or perhaps of death, fol-Who will say that this statute was not designed for oppression, that it was not written by a cumning hand for the pur-pose of making possible and lawful a perverted and cruel use of political power. It takes a man cunningly beyond the reach of the protection of the courts, and turns him over to the tender mercies of what little he can get out of such provisions as this:

He shall be detained and judgment sustended a reasonable time to enable him to procure a duplicate from the officer granting it, and in such cases the cost of said arrest and trial shall be in the discretion of the court. And any Chinese person, other than a Chinese laborer, having a right to be and remain in the United States, destring such certificate as evidence of such right, may apply for and receive the same without charge.

Then follows section 2, containing certain definitions as to lacerers. I do not know that I have any particular fault with that definition, but as to merchants I will read:

The term "merchant," as employed herein and in the acts of which this is amendatory, shall have the following meaning and none other: A merchant is a person engaged in buying and selling merchandise, at a fixed place of business, which business is conducted in his name, and who during the time he claims to be engaged as a merchant, does not engage in the performance of any manual labor, except such as is necessary in the conduct of his business as such merchant. ness as such merchant

One would naturally suppose that the vocation of a man who had been a merchant in the ordinary sense of the word, is something which the community in which he deals could testify to; but there is one particular provision in this definition concerning which I speak with considerable diffidence, namely, that he must do business in his own name. My reading has informed me, and conversation has instructed me, that of all people in the world the Chinese are an associative people in their business operations; that they have carried the ideas of companies and corporations and associations to a degree of refinement and perfection to which we have not approached, and yet under this provision, as to all the men who may belong to an association of that character who have pooled their stocks, capital, and profits as merchants and importers, invited to this country by treaty and confirmed by statute, they are absolutely deprived of the right of enjoying those business relations and can not exempt thems: lves from the punitory and pursuing clauses of this act, which follows them into every portion of this land and makes them liable to have the hand of numerous officials placed upon them without precept, warrant, or authority of law except as derived from this statute.

Mr. PLATT. He can not cut his own wood. Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Connecticut remarks that he can not cut his own wood except it is necessary in the conduct of his business as such merchant.

Where an application is made by a Chinaman for entrance into the United States on the ground that he was formerly engaged in this country merchant, he shall establish by the testimony of two credible with other than Chinese the fact that he conducted such business as here fore defined for at least one year before his departure from the Un States, and that during such year he was not engaged in the perform of any manual labor, except such as was necessary in the conduct o business as such merchant, and in default of such proof shall be relianding.

This whole proposed law is ex post facto, if that term can be applied to a proceeding which is not judicial, but political and administrative. Penalties are enacted which had no existence whatever in common law, statute law, or in legal contemplation of any kind, until the act of 1892 called them into being, and they deprive the Chinese of a legal status which was perfectly unas-

How is this class of offenses contrived and created under the general right of the Government to say what it shall do with aliens in its midst, concerning which the Supreme Court has settled the doctrine for the present, at least? A man is required to do something which he was never required to do before, to register, to take out a certificate. He does not do it. His reference to suprements the fusal creates the crime. It creates the crime, and the crime produces the penalty.

I find it hard to use language accurately here; bu after all has been said and done it results that this crime an.. this penalty are not justiciable matters; they are matters of possical and executive concern. After the studious use of judicial and forensic language thoughout this statute, and the invocation into this arena (for it is not a forum) of United Stat s judges for its execution, we are told, and told conclusively by the Supreme Court of the United States, that it is not a judicial, is not a criminal, is not a penal proceeding at all, but that all these consequences, from arrest down to conviction and execution of the sentence, are purely matters of political administration.

Such order of deportation shall be executed by the United States marshal of the district within which such order is .nade, and he shall execute the same with all convenient dispatch; and pending the execution of such order such Chinese person shall re-nain in the custody of the United States marshal, and shall not be admitted to bail.

I was going to say he might want to appeal. He can not apreal. The proceeding is not judicial. It is political and administrative. He might want to give bail, but he can not do it. That is cutoff. B ill is judicial. Political administration knows it not. Even while invoking the interposition of the superior officers of the Treasury or of the President of the United States the Chinese merchant who has come to this country must be dehe can not be admitted to bail.

Mr. GRAY. He can have a writ of habeas corpus, though.
Mr. DAVIS. I am not so certain about anything good in this et. I should want to examine it closely before I concede even that point to a gentleman so frank as my friend from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I am trying to find something good in it. Mr. DAVIS. The provision of the bill is:

Mr. DAVIS. The provision of the online:
The certificate herein provided for shall contain the photograph of the applicant, together with his name, local residence, and occupation, and a copy of such certificate, with a duplicate of such photograph attached, shall be filed in the office of the United States collector of internal revenue of the district in which such Chinaman makes application.
Such photographs in duplicate shall be furnished by each applicant in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

That is a matter of detail. I do not think it particular oppressive. I have a repugnance to culling upon any man within the protection of the law for his photograph to be filed away as a basis for a possible criminal prosecution or even for his protec-We call such collections of photographs in civilized and

Mr. PERKINS. They were at the World's Fair.
Mr. DAVIS. Yes, I have no doubt. We invited the Chinese to the World's Fair. China came with the meekness she has always shown, even when we tried to abrogate the treaty, and in the face of all this scandalous legislation she shamed us by a magnificent exhibition.

Mr. PERKINS: They had to have their photographs, though. Mr. DAVIS. I do not recollect any statute to that effect. Mr. PERKINS. It was a regulation.

Mr. DAVIS. I donot recollect any statute of the United States to that effect.
Mr. WHITE of California. There is no statute

Mr. DAVIS. Now, Mr. President, from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States respecting the action of the judge in executing this statute, it plainly follows that such action by him is not judicial but is political and administrative. He does not proceed upon precept, complaint, indiciment, or by jury, or in court. No judicial record is made of his action. A United States judge is attempted to be transformed into a political, executive, administrative officer. He is translated to a separate department of the Government. If I were a United States judge I would say "These duties which you have attempted to impose upon me are not judicial, and I shall not perform them." This Government has no power or authority by statute to impose duties of that character upon a judge without his consent. I would rather have been one of those French officials who issued lettres de cachet under Louis XIV. I would rather have been one of those self-constituted judges who sat at the entrance of the prisons during the massacres of the French Revolution and adjudged the emancipated captive to life or death as they chose. My friend, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], refers me to the fugitive-slave law; but there was judicial process, there was warrant, there was habeas corpus, there was a court and a judge acting judicially. He performed the administrative and political duties of his judicial office, but finding that, owing to the imperfections of the act of 1892, no particular officer was authorized to deport the Chinese person and no funds provided for this purpose, he issued an order, ironical, though perhaps not so intended, I think I can state its substance correctly), that this Chinese can go; he is set at large, to be deported when the United States furnishes the instrumentality for that purpose.

Mr. President, it was nearly one hundred years ago when the only precedent for this legislation found a place on our statute During the Administration of John Adams, and in the year 1798, three alien acts were passed, the material part of which was that the President of the United States was given the power to deport any alien who it could be reasonably apprehended was guilty, or intended to be guilty, of treasonable practices or was undesirable as a denizen. It was a war measure, and nobody attempted to justify it by any other pretext. It was designed for "war in procinct," to use the words of Milton. The frigates of the United States had been engaged in battle with the frigates of the French Directory in the West Indian waters, and the privateers of France, under letters of marque and reprisal, were carrying American cargoes into ports for condemnation prize. Three of our envoys who had been at Paris in the endeavor to adjust our very difficult relations with that peculiar government, had been subjected to importunities for money as a bribe by emmissaries of Barras, the voluptuary, and of Talleyrand, that cynical and diplomatic peculator, and they had returned to this country. The people rose in indignation, and Congress granted to the President of the United States the power conferred by the alien acts of 1798. What was the result? The nation rose in protest against the statute. It swept the Republican party (so called) of that day from power, and it gave to their opponents an uninterrupted ascendancy for over twenty years.

In vain John Adams, from his place as President, and from his retirement, protested and proclaimed that the statute was justifiable as a war measure, and justifiable on that ground alone. It produced opinions which have been cardinal as doctrines of constitutional law for many of our most advanced thinkers and constitutional law for many of our most advanced timkers and statesmen; and I shall beg permission to read what James Madison said. It is refreshing to hear how clearly his voice speaks, as if attuned to-day, from across the interval of nearly a hundred years, respecting this act, designed as a measure of protection at that time. Mr. Madison wrote:

years, respecting this act, designed as a measure of protection at that time. Mr. Madison wrote:

With respect to alien enemies, no doubt has been intimated as to the Federal authority over them: the Constitution having expressly delegated to Congress the power to declare war against any nation, and, of course, to treat it and all its members as enemies. With respect to aliens who are not enemies, but members as enemies. With respect to aliens who are not enemies, but members of nations in peace and amity with the United States, the power assumed by the act of Congress is denied to be constitutional; and it is accordingly against this act that the protest of the General Assembly is expressly and exclusively directed. (Ibid., 554).

Were it admitted, as is contended, that the "act concerning aliens" has for its object, not a penal, but a preventive justice, it would still remain to be proved that it comes within the constitutional power of the Federal legislature, and, if within its power, that the legislature has exercised it in a constitutional manner. * * But it can never be admitted that the removal of aliens, suthorized by the act, is to be considered, not as punishment for an offense, but as a measure of precuation and prevention.

If the banishment of an alien from a country into which he has been invited as the asylum most auspicious to his happiness—a country where he may have formed the most tender connections; where he may have invested his entire property, and acquired property of the real and permanent as well as the movable and temporary kind; where he enjoys, under the laws, a greater share of the blessings of personal security and personal interty than he can elsewhere hope for; * * if a banishment of this sort be not a punishment, and among the severest of punishments, it would be difficult to imagine a doom to which the name can be applied. And, if it be a punishment, it will remain to be inquired whether it can be constitutionally inflicted, on mere suspicion, by the single will of the executi

they owe on one hand a temporary obedience they are entitled in return to their protection and advantage. If aliens had no rights under the Constitution, they might not only be banished, but even capitally punished without a jury or the other incidents to a fair trial. But so far has a contrary principle been carried in every part of the United States, that except on charges of treason an alien has, besides all the common privileges, the special one of being tried by a jury of which one-half may be also aliens. It is said, further, that, by the law and practice of nations, aliens may be removed, at discretion, for offenses against the law of nations; that to be dangerous to the peace of society is, in aliens, one of those offenses.

The distinction between alien enemies and alien friends is a clear and conclusive answer to this argument. Alien enemies are under the law of nations, and liable to be punished for offenses against it. Alien friends, except in the single case of public ministers, are under the municipal law, and must be tried and punished according to that law only. (Ibid., 556.)

But I need not read further.

Now, Mr. President, it may be said that the Supreme Court of the United States has overruled some of the constitutional positions thus taken by Mr. Madison; but if it has, it has simply defined our powers; it has not extended them. Because the Supreme Court of the United States has said that there is a region of power limitless in extent open to us, we are not bound to enter All things may be lawful to us, but all things are not expedient. Therefore I say, inasmuch as this matter is not judicial, that if we are to proceed at all under this our political, administrative, and executive power to use these terrible instrumentalities of abuse by irresponsible persons, which this law so amply confers upon them, such instrumentalities should be regulated by a statute bringing them within and under judicial con-

The Supreme Court has decided that in no event and under no existing legislation can the Chinese at any stage in the proceeding, whether initiative or as they goon or finally, be brought within the protection of the judiciary. I have no doubt that it is general opinion of the profession when the act of 1892 was I have no doubt that it was the that somewhere in the course of the proceedings the judiciary could lawfully intervene, as it now seems it can not. Hence I am anxious to see this legislation changed in some way so that if immigration from China to this country is to cease (and I confess it seems to me very desirable that it shall) this country shall not scandalize and disgrace itself by such political, arbitrary, and administrative processes as this legislation has been held to war-

Mr. GRAY. We do not want the Chinese to assimilate

Mr. DAVIS. Nobody does; and we do not want that kind of

Mr. President, if the Chinese can be made amenable to such discipline as this by refusing to register, they can be made amenable for any other refusal that may result from an astutely framed statute. This being a political matter, a matter of administration, the United States can pass a law that any Chinaman who refuses to conform to the ordinances of San Francisco shall be deported, or that any Chinese person over 45 years of age shall be deported. There is no limitation; the power of this Government is absolute over these people politically and administratively, because the law is a justification unto itself and can not be judicially executed.

Again, if you can proceed, under the decision of the Supreme Court, against all the Chinese in this country, you can proceed, as this act does, in some respects, against a certain class. If you can do that, you can proceed against one Chinese by special legislation of this character. You can enact that certain men, supposed to be members of the Six Companies, shall be deported. If any one should establish a Chinese newspaper in this counand it was not agreeable, you can enact that any man establishing and editing a Chinese newspaper shall be deported; or any other act or omission, however innocent, however indif-ferent in the general current of political or social concerns, can be made the standard, and, the law being a justification unto itself, and the merest instrumentality of the executive power of the Government, the Chinese against whom the blow is directed can be deported.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether he thinks that the judgment of the Supreme Court in the late he thinks that the judgment of the Supreme Court in the late case in which they were called upon to deliver an opinion goes to the extent which he has described?

Mr. DAVIS. I think it does.

Mr. GRAY. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the obligations of the Constitution of the United States rest just as heavily upon us as Senators as they do upon the Supreme Court; that the Supreme Court may mark out the area into which legislative power may extend, in their opinion, but it does not relieve the judgment of an individual Senator from the duty of deciding for himself in any given case as to what the Constitution means.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Delaware has expressed my opinion in the most precise and apt manner. That is precisely my view, and upon that I stand, although I differ from the Senator in the argument I am making against this whole body of legislation.

More than that can be done. As I said, if all can be deported, classes can, a dozen can, one can. Unquestionably a statute could be passed ordering the deportation under this decision of every Chinese who, after a period of six months, should be found living within a city of 6,000 people, or within the city of San Francisco, which has been the most complaining, and perhaps justly so, upon this question. The complaint is not, as I understand it, that the Chinese through the country, in the orange groves, the vineyards, and wheat fields and mines are an unmixed evil, but it is their conglomeration in the great city of the coast, at the Golden Gate, that is objected to.

We might under the compendious and universal power which the Supreme Court has confirmed in Congress, pass an act that all Chinese found living in San Francisco shall be subject to deportation. There would be sense and humanity in that, if controlled by judicial processes. It would drive that idle class back home or out into the surrounding country, where, I am informed, laborers of that class are much to be desired and are not too plen-

Mr. WHITE of California. The Senator is mistaken in that regard.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, there is no nation on the continent of Europe, however feeble, that we would ever have enacted this legislation against, however undesirable their laboring people as immigrants. Our conscience would not have permitted it, to say nothing of the fear of reprisal or retribution from the other nation. We have a general idea, unhappily too prevalent, that we need not deal with the Chinese upon the same footing of equal binding force and obligation, to say nothing of equality of right, that we deal with other people. Yet, Mr. President, we can not imagine that a nation like China is going to restforever quietly under these inflictions. She has protested against this legislation from the beginning.

Suppose she should treat our missionaries, those Christian

Suppose she should treat our missionaries, those Christian men and women who have erected the cross of the Redeemer throughout that Empire, as we have treated and propose to treat her subjects in this country. The voice of the entire American people would be for war.

China is the most ancient empire in the world. She contains one-fifth of the human race. She was in her prime when the phalanx of the Macedonian stood upon the banks of the Indus, and she saw the Roman Empire fade like an "insubstantial pageant" and "leave not a rack behind." And it is not improbable that she will survive the most stable governments of to-day as mere ephemera in the experience of her existence. Yet, old and colossal and impenetrable as she has hitherto been, that vast reservoir of wealth, that swarming hive of population has, since the opium war, been slowly yielding to the advances of civilization and throwing open that great market to the world. Yet we, perhaps from passion, perhaps in part to carry out an ill-founded desire, are jeopardizing that commerce for which not only there, but elsewhere, we have been looking intently for many years, trying to build up our American shipping and then to reëstablish and extend our commercial relations with all the countries of the world.

Can anyone suppose that, with legislation of this character, enforced in this way, the American merchant or the American marine are to have eventually their share in that immense and rapidly growing commerce?

Great Britain has no trouble of that kind. She enacts no laws of this character against the Chinese. They go up into British North America and settle there, subject only to head money. I do not know that they have enacted any hostile laws, though I think Australia has.

Mr. WHITE of California. All countries have, except the Fiji Islands.

Mr. DAVIS. I say that the Dominion of Canada has not enacted exclusion laws against the Chinese. Is it not worth while to consider whether means can not be adopted to preserve a good understanding between us and the Chinese Empire, complaisant and yielding as it has always been on this subject of immigration. China does not want its people to come here. It disapproves it. To our objections to their coming among us, the Chinese Empire has always responded according to our desire. As my friend, the junior Senator from California [Mr. Perkins], said in his very interesting speech of yesterday, their bones are not even permitted to remain here. They are sent back.

are not even permitted to remain here. They are sent back. What is that commerce? In 1891 the imports into China, reduced as nearly as I can reduce them to our money, amounted to $167,500,000, and the exports were $101,000,000 in round numbers. I mean from all over the globe. Of this Great Britain had by far the largest part, but the authority which I consulted states that the United States comes next. It is a growing commerce. The needs of that innumerable horde of people, when they get to needing what we have to give them, will increase more and more every year, for civilization creates wants which will extend enormously.

The Chinese Government has granted a concession to its own subjects to build a railroad from a city on the coast to Peking, over 1,000 miles, and a railroad is now being constructed from the north coast of the Empire to the boundary line between it and Russia.

Every indication of that kind tends to show that in the slow process of time—and events have always been slow to that people—great advantages are destined to come to the civilized world. Why, then, provoke antagonism? Why build up a wall higher and more impregnable than the Chinese wall was in the old time before the Tartar invasion?

Mr. President, no country in Europe has such legislation as that against which I speak. Deportations of peoples have not been unknown in history, but they have been infrequent. The Spaniards expelled the Moors from Spain. History has written her lines of reprobation over that atrocity, and Spain has never recovered from it to this day. The edict of Nantes was revoked, and the best and most industrious people in France fled from that kingdom and built up great industries in England; many of them came to South Carolina and formed some of the choicest blood in that State. Russia has expelled the Jews, and how the moral sentiment of the civilized world has risen against the deed! It has provoked the protest of the religious press, the indignation of every tolerant man, and it has unlocked the coffers of charity. The President of the United States saw fit to give to Congress in his message an expression of his disapproval, and he voiced the sentiment of this country. Yet all the time this was going on, we have been legislating and insisting with Pharisaical self-righteousness in regard to the Chinese precisely in the manner in which the autocrat of Russia has been proceeding against the Jews, and for which we reprobated him.

Upon the table of the Secretary lie the protests of some of the best elements of this country, and among them the protests of faculties of universities. We may say in a cynical way, "we shall not regard them; they are not minding their business; they would best attend to their own concerns;" but I tell you that there is a voice in this country which will not be stilled, but which will be heard. We can not afford, no party can afford—and I speak now from no party standpoint whatever—no party can afford to ignore or treat with silent contempt, or pass by such protests as these. That was tried in the days of slavery. It failed, and if public sentiment ever awakens upon this subject we shall not then attempt by these devices and tricks of legislation to accomplish that indirectly which we would not dare to attempt directly.

Opposed as I am to Chinese immigration, wishing to see this evil remedied, let me call attention to another fact.

What is this Mongolian horde that will overrun this country like the hordes of Ghengis Khan? The United States has 65,000,000 people. How many Chinese are there in the United States? One hundred and six thousand according to the last census. There is not a thousand difference between the number who were here in 1890, according to the census, and the number here in 1880. In 1880 the Chinese population of San Francisco was 25,000 in round numbers; in 1890, it was 21,000—a falling off of 4,000. By natural processes this matter is being settled.

Mr. President, I have taken more time than I intended, but the subject is one of large proportions and of infinite complexity the more it is considered.

This is a very small part of the case in opposition to the system of legislation now protested against. Much more might be said of it. Opposed as I am to Chinese immigration, wishing to see the contact of that people with ours cease as soon as possible, I do desire to see expelled from our statute books this flagitious and ferocious legislation which it is proposed to continue and make more efficacious by the amendment to the act of 1892, now under consideration.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. President, I will state that I desire to address the Senate quite briefly upon the pending bill, and if there is any other Senator who desires to speak I shall yield to him. I scarcely desire to speak twice, and I propose when I make my remarks to answer such objections as may be m do. I think the Senator from Florida [Mr. Call.] desired to address the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it was my purpose to submit a few brief observations to the Senate upon this bill which proposes to amend the act of 1892, which has been reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I have always opposed legislation against the Chinese in the form and manner which it has been proposed. Certainly it may be said that every community has a right to protect itself against be said that every community has a right to protect itself against any class of people who have not acquired a right of residence amongst them. Whatever may be the motives which actuate a community, the right of self-preservation demands that they shall exclude from their midst those who, not being citizens, not belonging to that community, have not the same rights of residence there. In that sense the people of California or of any other State would have a right to protect themselves, in accordance with the constitutional obligations imposed upon them.

Therefore, in our relations with the Chinese Government, in my judgment, the treaty provision should be so made that a community might be exempted from the obligation of receiving the Chinese or any other class of people; but that the relations of a great country with another and a most important portion of the population of the globe should be regulated entirely by the consideration that particular localities and small portions of the entire population of the country, and a very limited part of its public interest, its commercial interests should be the controlling element in establishing the relations of one country with another important commercial country is a proposition which can not be maintained. Nor can it be, in my judgment, logically and properly defended that six to seven hundred millions of the people of the globe are so demoralized in character, so destitute of virtue and of the characteristies which belong to the improvement of mankind, as to be unworthy of relations, social, political, literary, and commercial with other parts of the globe.

To suppose that the people of Caina, constituting a vast portion of the population of the globe, antedating in civilization every other people, antedating, not by years, but by decades of years, and not by decades of years, but by decades of centuries, every other people, have not within them and within their civil polity and their commercial relations and their industrial relations, something which is cap ble of improvement, something from which we can derive advantage—a people from whom we have learned every art, every science; who have taught us in agriculture the cultivation and the origin of many of those fruits and vegetables upon which we now find our subsistence—to suppose that the relations of this country with that vast population are to be decided upon the proposition that a hundred or two hundred thousand Chinese who have come to this country have brought with them vicious habits and propensities, have introduced alow order of vice, and that contamination must result to every community from them, is an entirely illogical proposition which can not be true.

The Creator is not at fault that He should have created this vast portion of the human race as we decide in these arguments and propositions. Mr. President, there is no foundation in the assertion of this proposition.

Admit it as a fact that these people who have come over here have been vicious, that they have introduced vice, is that a reason why we should have no proper commercial relations with 700,000,000 people—for the population of China is variously estimated at from 350,000,000 to 700,000,000? Do we not know that there must be some great principle of life in a vast population of this character, adhering together for hundreds upon hundreds of years, and containing within themselves the original propositions and principles of almost every invention and every industrial improvement and science?

But, Mr. President, I acquiesce in the proposition that there may be an excess of population in any particular locality; that there may be an excess of labor; and that the community where it exists should be protected from it. I admit that the Chinese are not a people similar to ourselves any more than the African race who were brought over here and have been amongst us for many years. The physical differences between them are no greater, and yet we should not be willing to introduce from Africa or from China a vast population of this kind to intermix with our own.

Admit that to be true, and admit it to be true that we should establish such treaty arrangements as will prevent that result. is there any need in p oviding under the Constitution of the United States that we should make a treaty with China by which such classes of Chinese should be permitted to come to the United States, in such numbers and under such restrictions as might be proper, but not be permitted, under this treaty regulation, to reside in the State which objected to their residence and whose laws forbade at? The Constitution of the United States, in providing that up to a certain period of time the migration of persons admitted by any State should not be prohibited, asserts by clear implication that after that period o time the State may admit or prohibit, if Congress does not forbid it, the migration or immigration of such persons into their midst as they see fit.

So the Constitution is clear that a treaty may be made with China by which the State of California would be entirely protected from the immigration of any Chinese for residence or any other purpose. A treaty might be made by which the Chinese inhabitants of California might be deported under proper conditions and with proper reservations as to their rights. I take it that the Chinese Government would not make objection to a reasonable provision protecting the rights of Chinese residents here; but everywhere, since I have been here, and this legislation has been proposed and enacted, the most severe and proscriptive provisions have been inserted in these treaties in relation to the Chinese upon the assumption that they were utterly unfit for any kind of relation or any kind of contact with our people, that they serve no useful industrial purpose, that they undermine the existing labor and pursuits and industries of our people, that they have attained a degree of economy in 1 bor and subsistence which enables them to take the place of all our people.

Mr. President, I do not entertain any of these ideas. I believe if there is anything in government, it ought to be sufficient to correct the vices of people; if there be anything in the power of legislation, it ought to be sufficient to represe those vicious practices in California and elsewhere; and I think the int oduction of this kind of labor devoted to proper purposes, limited by treaty regulation, with these Chinese admitted under some provision by which they could be identified in pursuits which are needed in this country, might be very useful. I see the vast region of the Mississippi River, which needs to be leveed, which needs to be protected from the floods which come every year: I perceive the vast waste of rich fields in the Southern States left uncultivated; I can see additional means of transportation needed throughout this whole country.

portation needed throughout this whole country.

Why, in our enactments, should not some view be had to these necessities? Why should we not in our treaty regulations with China consider that there may be means provided which are neither harsh nor un ust nor cruel, by which the migration from that country to this might be regulated, limited, and prohibited at times if necessary? I can see a reason why not.

at times if necessary? I can see no reason why not.

If these Chinese are so prolific and they so overflow our country, and are so ingenious that they find their entrance into our country, it seems to me they might be utilized.

The economies of a country must be based upon some permanent and established foundation. As I said before, it is true that there may be an excess of 1 bor, there may be an excess of population in particular localities, and to that end and for the country it will be wise to legislate for the prevention of the one and for the removal of the other; but you can not establish an economy of industry, of legislation, of policy upon that which may be and must be a mere local and isolated fact or condition. The public economies of industry demand that wherever labor can be employed and made efficient it is a beneficent contribution to the human race. A proper division of labor in every country must result to the advantage of the country; and there are employments for labor in our own country without interfering with the great mass of American labor, which, wisely directed, would make use of a large portion of the immigration which would naturally come here.

But these are considerations foreign to the pending bill. The law which has been passed in reference to the Chinese was, in my opinion, a violation of our treaty obligations; it was in violation of all the principles of our jurisprudence; it denied a fair trial and it plue of the liberty of these people in the hunds of any and every individual who should occupy some subordinate executive position. It permit ed a collector of customs to say that a man was a Chinaman and to turn him back from the ports of our country, without inquiry, in defiance of whatever the fact might be. In all those respects it was a violation of our solemn treaty obligations and a violation of the established course of jurisprudence in all civilized countries.

But what then? We have now an amendment reported here. For what purpose? To relieve a specific difficulty, a difficulty of which the Chinese Government complains, a difficulty which embarrasses the Administration.

I desire to say here, for one, that I take no part in the criticisms upon the Executive and upon his Administration. I expect it to be a distinguished Administration, and that it will yield to this country the relief which is demanded upon various subjects requiring reform and change. I do not agree with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] in the estimate which he has put upon the Executive. I think the President is a great and distinguished leader of thought, and that he will concur in the wise economies which may be decided upon by a majority of the American people: but to enable the Administration to conduct the foreign relations of this country, we must aid it by such amendment of the laws as will be satisfactory and at the same

The Chinese Government complain of these harsh features. They assert their willingness to cooperate with this Government in carrying out whatever policy may be adopted by the American people; but they ask that it shall be done with due regard to diplomatic forms, to established principles of international jurisprudence, with a proper respect for them, and with proper kindness to their subjects. That is a reasonable demand. The law as itstands does not afford to them the protection which it ought. The law viol test he treaty obligations which have been made with China. The pending amendment proposes in a small degree to remove that. It proposes to allow an extension of six months' time to comply with the hard, arbitrary, and harsh features of the old law.

For myself I should prefer the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. I should prefer to have an entire change in the cnaracter and nature of those provisions; I should prefer negotiations made anew with the Government of China to carry out the established will of the American people in these respects with moderation, with fairness, with justice, with a consideration for the antiquity, the civilization, and the future development of this large portion of the human race.

I concur in the criticisms which have been made on our former legislation in this regard; but what shall we do? Shall we stand here and allow this greatevil to continue—the continued deportation of these people for the nonexecution of the law which would be unsatisfactory to all? Therefore I acquiesce in the amendment and shall give to it my support; but I desire in my place in the Senate to say, as I have said before, that, whenever an opportunity is afforded to me, I shall give my vote for a change in the character of this legislation.

I am in favor of the widest and broadest commercial relations with China. Here we have a great interest which we have been discussing for years; we have mines of silver, we have great mineral productions, we have a commerce which may be widely extended with this great population of from three hundred and fifty to six or seven hundred million people, as the case may be. Shall we disregard the uses which may be made of these great commercial incrests to our advantage? When great contentions upon the questions of currency, finance, and silver are being conducted, there is a market worthy of our consideration. Shall we ignore the fact and treat these people so as to cut off our commercial relations with them or so as to give to other nations the advantage of them.

It seems to me there is no force in the argument that the question of the in luence of a few hundred thousand Chinese in particular localities of our country shall determine the great question of our commerce al relations with six or seven hundred million people who unquestionably are great producers and great consumers, and who constitute a great factor in the commercial relations of the whole world.

For that reason, while I shall support this amendment, for myself I protest against the conclusions which are presented here, that on account of the vicious propensities of a small portion of this people, they are unfit for any relations with us.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments with reference to the pending measure, as I deem it essential, if we desire to transact any business at all concerning it, that the matter should be brought to a head at once.

I have listened to all of the arguments made by the distinguished Senators who have addressed themselves to this bill, and I have heard many things regarding the Chinese which I never heard before. Perhaps this is because I know something about the race, while Senators who have furnished the information have never been brought in contact with those of whom they have treated.

A gentleman was once asked whether he had ever seen the Allegheny Mountains. He replied: "Why, sir: of course I have. Did not I work for the contractor who built them?" There are remarks made here with relation to the Chinese which give me the impression that Senators who have addressed us upon the subject, while acting innocently, have nevertheless committed themselves without full knowledge or correct advice.

themselves without full knowledge or correct advice.

I do not intend to describe the condition of the Chinese. This has been done here so often by those thoroughly competent for the task that I should deem it an intimation that Senators were unable to appreciate facts when presented plainly, if I endeavored to travel over the ground again.

It is admitted that the people of California have succeeded in obtaining a major portion of this undesirable element. The Chinese have come to us. We have them. We who are side by side with them, who move among them, who necessarily learn something about them, are told by Senators who have had no such opportunity, who view them from afar, that they constitute an immigration that is rather valuable, and that after all they are a desirable people to cultivate.

In Harper's Weekly, of date July 23, and in another number of the same weekly dated July 30, 1870, I find illustrations accompanied by an article in which we are informed that a certain gentieman, Mr. Sampson, residing in North Adams, Mass., who was conducting a boot and shoe business in that enterprising locality, found himself unable, or at least unwilling, to pay to his white employes the sums which they demanded: he accordingly sent an agent to California and imported a number of Chinese operatives.

The pictures to which I allude illustrate the Mongolians at work in a Massachusetts shoe shop. But, Mr. President, it turned out in a very few days that there was a commotion in that good old Commonwealth, and the Chinamen who had been thus imported found it well to leave at a speed much greater than that displayed at the time of their advent.

than that displayed at the time of their advent.

Hence, I may be permitted to remark that unless there has been a change of opinion the gentlemen who regard the Chinamen as advantageous for California do not regard them as very desirable for themselves.

In the city of San Francisco there are congregated an immense number of Chinese. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Davis], who so ably and eloquently championed their cause here, has stated that he has witnessed transactions or sights in that locality of a horrible character. Indeed no one can visit the place without being made aware that a Chinaman differs from any one ever before brought within the scope of his observation.

The Senator also referred to the circumstance that Chinamen send their countrymen's bones to Asia, thus indicating, I suppose, a belief that this country is scurcely good enough to hold the relicts. No special objection is made to the deport tion of Chinamen's bones, but the people of California prefir that the Chinaman should go to China before he has reached a state where it is in possible to transport more than a portion of his being.

is inpossible to transport more than a portion of his being.

In this connection, and as illustrative of Chinese habits, I might mention the fact that some years ago an officer was walking upon his beat on Dapont street. San Francisco, when he detected a peculiar odor permeating the atmosphere. While he was tolerably familiar with the flavor of the effluvia of Chinatown, as he had been in the habit of taking care of that somewhat singular locality, yet there was something unusual about this, something differing from the ordinary. He procured on of his associates to accompany him, and entering an adjacent Chinese dwelling and, passing three or four stories underground, they came to a room beneath the sidewalk wherein the air was unendurably corrupt.

There they found a great caldron in which there were bodies of deceased Chinamen, and these were being boiled for the purpose of extracting the bones for shipment. The chef who seemed to preside over the operation smiled as the officers entered, and explained to them quite fully that this was by far the most approved method of preparing the proposed consignment. Of course the institution was suppressed as a nuisance.

Mr. President, Senators have probably heard of highbinders. A highbinder, as we understand the matter, is an individual whose business it is to murder for hire. Commotions in Chinese society caused by highbinder warfare are not infrequent. Such a contest simply means that conflicting associations of those whose business is assassination have determined to settle in blood issues arising as the result of their nefarious trade. In San Franciscoit is common knowledge that the highbinder executes the edicts and commands of his employer. A highbinder is occasionally caught after he has killed some one, and upon conviction is hanged. His shirt of mail, suspended as a trophy in the police department, indicates that he was an individual of considerable enterprise and that he possessed the inventive genius which is so greatly admired by his American advocates.

We have sought to deal with the Chinese in a humane manner. We have done our best to shield them from violence. Charges to the contrary are baseless; and while we have been criticised because of our attitude towards the Chinese, the fact remains that they prefer to stay in California rather than to go anywhere else. With all our faults they enjoy residence with us. They have no confidence that they will be well and profitably received in the bosoms of those who loudly demand unrestricted immigration and who appear to consult Chinese convenience rather than the interests of our own race.

Mr. President, it has been said that the legislation proposed here is peculiar. So it is peculiar, because it deals with a peculiar subject and a peculiar people. It deals with a race differing from all others in essential particulars. The Senator from Minnesota eloquently referred to the antiquity of the Chinese Empire and spoke of its ancient greatness. He prophesied that it will stand when existing empires, republics, and dynasties have passed from the earth. Perhaps this may prove true; but the Chinese Empire of to-day is not a model of progression. On the contrary, it presents the worst features of modern society. It is incapable of absorbing knowledge and oblivious to the demands of enlightenment. enlightenment.

Born in a State where Chinamen have been from the time of the organization of the government; witnessing them and their conduct as a boy, as a man, in a professional and in other capacities, I am thoroughly familiar with their habits, with their capabilities, and their moral status. When Senators condemn this bill because it discredits the Chinaman as a witness, they forget that such a rule merely recognizes the existence of a characteristic, to disregard which would be to assert that it is impossible for this Government to maintain or enforce its laws. Never—and I say it unqualifiedly—never have I known a Chinaman whom I would believe under oath in a matter in which he was interested. Can that be said of any other class or of any other people? It is not for me to philosophize, to analyze the Chinese disposition, or to seek to draw from their history anything accounting for these deficiencies. I am speaking of things as they exist. This clause is essential to the efficiency of the measure.

So true is it, Mr. President, that a Chinaman can not be be-lieved on oath, that when to tell the truth in a court of justice would be beneficial to him it is often almost impossible to induce him to fully declare it because he does not believe that there can be any association of rectitude with his interests. Chinaman is presented before a judge or a jury, and there is no testimony explanatory of his declarations, it is often impossible to reach a satisfactory conclusion. It is generally difficult to discern which of two contesting Mongolians approaches to the truth. They have absolutely no conception of their duties in this regard

When acting in an official capacity upon a certain occasion I was called into court to attend to the public interest in a small case. A battery charge was involved. The prosecutor and the defendant were Chinamen. The former's face was discolored, showing evidence of injurious contact. He had been somewhat disfigured. He claimed that a member of another company, a was had. As prosecuting officer I introduced the complaining Chinaman and six other Chinese witnesses. The defendant's counsel asked each of them to which company he belonged, and each swore that he was a member of the company of the prosecuting witness. Then came the defendant and he introduced and the company of the prosecuting witness. six Chinese witnesses; each of whom was a member of the com-pany to which the defendant belonged, and each swore absolutely and positively that defendant was not present when the assault was said to have taken place, though the other seven witnesses had testified emphatically that defendant committed the battery.

I mention this as illustrating the proposition that a Chinaman will swear according to the interest and orders of his company. If there is litigation among Chinamen, and there are 75 Chinese witnesses upon one side and 75 Chinese witnesses upon the other side, upon investigation you will find that all the plaintiff's witnesses belong to one company and that all the defendant's witnesses recognize another company. Their habits and customs are not such as to make them either valuable or tolerable residents of any civilized community.

Upon another occasion I was called upon to prosecute a Chinaman for the murder of another Chinaman. I succeeded in procuring a conviction. The court believed that there had been an error in the trial, some misruling upon a question connected with the testimony, and a new trial was granted. When the time for the new trial approached I visited the Chinaman representing the company to which the decedent had pertained, and told him that I desired the witnesses who had been present at the former trial to appear once more in court as witnesses. He shook his head and said that they could not be found. I said "Where are they?" He did not know. I pressed him, and he advised me to dismiss the case. After considerable interrogation I arrived at this state of facts: The Chinaman who had been killed was a member of the company which the man with whom I was conversing represented, and the Chinaman who did the killing was a member of another company: and the two companies came together and appraised the dead Chinaman at $1,000, and had passed the money and the receipts. fore the witnesses could no longer be found.

Is it for a class of people to whom this is an every-day and monotonous transaction that we are asked to sacrifice the wishes and the comfort of the citizens of the American Republic?

Mr. President, I am as charitable and kind-hearted, I trust, as any man who is within this Chamber or elsewhere. I would as quickly, I hope, as any one else put myself out to alleviate suffering and perform those duties which charity enjoins upon a But I am confronted with a situation that threatens Christian. ruin to my own people; and when I am called upon to choose between them and an alien race incapable of virtue and unappreciative of vice, then I stand by my own hearthstone and guard my own home.

Senators who know but little of these things say much to the senators who know but ittill of these things say much to the effect that we have been disregarding a treaty. Mr. President, the Chinese Government has never in good faith attempted to stand by its treaty. When it appeared to this Government and to the Congress of the United States that the treaty that had been adopted and ratified in 1880 needed revision, there was an effort made by us to accomplish such revision. As stated in the very able message of Mr. Cleveland, presented to this body when he was formerly President of the United States, this Government, through its commissioners, prepared a treaty which was acceptable to the Chinese minister here, and which every one supposed would be ratified. This proposed engagement was submitted to the Chinese Government, and there it rested for a period of about six months without any action whatever.

Our minister repeatedly and urgently called the attention of the Imperial Government to the pendency of that treaty, to the demand upon the part of the citizens of the United States that it should be acted on. No response whatever was given. Thereupon Mr. Cleveland signed the act of 1888 and sent to Congress the message to which I have referred upon another occasion.

To the Congress:

I have this day approved House bill No. 11,336, supplementary to an actentitled "An act to execute treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved the 6th day of May, 1882.

It seems to me that some suggestions and recommendations may properly accompany my approval of this bill.

Its object is to more effectually accomplish by legislation the exclusion from this country of Chinese laborers.

The experiment of blending the social habits and mutual race idiosyncrasies of the Chinese laboring classes with those of the great body of the people of the United States has been proved by the experience of twenty years, and ever since the Burlingame treaty of 1868, to be in every sense unwise, impolitic, and injurious to both nations. With the lapse of time the necessity for its abandonment has grown in force, until those having in charge the government of the respective countries have resolved to modify and sufficiently abrogate all those features of prior conventional arrangements which permitted the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States.

In modification of prior conventions the treaty of November 17, 1880, was concluded, whereby, in the first article thereof, it was agreed that the United States should at will regulate, Himit, or suspend the coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, but not absolutely prohibit it; and under this article an act of Congress approved on May 6, 1882 (see volume 22, page 58, Statutes at Large), and amended July 5, 1884 (volume 23, page 115, Statutes at Large), and amended July 5, 1884 (volume 23, page 165, Statutes at Large), and are regulated the going and coming of Chinese laborers to the United States, and regulated the going and coming of such Chinese laborers as were at that time in the United States.

It was, however, soon made evident that the mercenary greed of the parties who were trading in the labor of this class of the Chinese population was proving too strong for the just execution of the law, and that the virnal defeat of the object and defeat of the object and intent of both law and treaty was being fraiddlenly accomplished by false pretense and perjury, contrary to the expressed will of both Governments.

To such an extent has the successful violation of the treaty and the laws enacted for its execution progressed that the courts in the Pacific States have been for some time past overwhelmed by the examination of cases of Chines laborers who are charged with having entered our ports under frauduent certificates of return or seek to establish by perjury the claim of prior residence.

laborers who are charged with having entered our ports under fraudulent certificates of return or seek to establish by perjury the claim of prior residence.

Such demonstration of the inoperative and inefficient condition of the treaty and law has produced deep-seated and increasing discontent among the people of the United States, and especially with those resident on the Pacific coast. This has induced me to omit no effort to find an effectual remely for the evils complained of, and to answer the earnest popular demand for the absolute exclusion of Chinese laborers having objects and purposes unlike our own, and wholly disconnected with American citizenship.

Aided by the presence in this country of able and intelligent diplomatic and consular officers of the Chinese Government, and the representations made from time to time by our minister in China under the instructions of the Department of State, the actual condition of public sentiment and the status of affairs in the United States has been fully appreciated by that Government, and in August. 1886, our minister at Peking received from the Chinese foreign office a communication announcing that China, of her own accord, proposed to establish a system of strict and absolute prohibition of her laborer, under heavy penalties, from coming to the United States, and likewise to prohibit the return to the United States of any Chinese laborer who had at any time gone back to China. "in order" (in the words of the communication "that the Chinese laborers may gradually be reduced in number and causes of danger averted and lives preserved."

This view of the Chinese Government, so completely in harmony with that of the United States, was by my direction speedily formulated in a treaty draft between the two nations, embodying the propositions so presented by the Chinese foreign office.

The deliberations, frequent oral discussions, and correspondence on the general questions that ensued have been fully communicated by me to the Senate at the present session, and, as co

EXECUTIVE MANSION, October 1, 1889.

In that message the President tersely states ample reasons for the belief that China had absolutely refused to enter into any stipulation with us at att. She stood without action, inert and impassive, determined to do nothing that we wished her to do, defiant and morose. It is true that a treaty is an obligation, binding at least in the forum of the national conscience; but it is not a fact that a nation is bound to stand by a treaty forever, and to see its own interests and the interests which it was organized to conserve sacrificed upon the altar of sentimentality.

When China refused to reasonably modify this treaty; when her people, in violation of the terms of a preceding compact were constantly coming to this country, intruding upon shores upon which it was not lawful for them to tread. When Chinese offiwhich it was not lawful for them to tread. When Chinese offi-cials aided and abetted these transactions, then I assert the time had come when it was but justice to our own citizens to enact such laws as might be deemed adequate for our defense. this condition of affairs the statutes mentioned were passed-lawfully, justly, and properly.

No doubt exists of the power of the Congress of the United States to legislate notwithstanding a treaty. It is true that the power should be rarely exercised. It is a fact, Mr. President, that we should under all circumstances endeavor to adhere to the engagements which we may have made. But there are times, as every writer upon such subjects concedes, when a nation is justified in paying no further attention to a treaty. One of these occasions, recognized by all authorities upon international law, is disclosed when one party violates the terms of a treaty. behavior warrants the other party in regarding the contract terminated.

The principal object of the legislation which is now sought to be enacted here, and of the legislation which we have heretofore adopted, has been to prevent the coming to this country of the Chinamen whom China herself admitted should not be per-mitted among us, but who have been allowed to come by China spite of the solemn obligations into which that nation entered. This violation of treaty stipulations by China was long anterior to the legislation of 1888, was provocative of that legislation, and made that necessary.

Therefore, Mr. President, this Government stands absolutely acquitted of the accusations made against it. It is not with good grace that these charges should be made upon this floor by Senators who themselves have participated in the enactment of the legislation which they now denounce. If Senators have done nothing worse and nothing which will more subject them to crittieism than that which they performed in voting for the legisla-tion sought by the people of the Pacific coast, they will never have occasion for sorrow or pain.

This act, Mr. President, as I have said, is justifiable where it demands testimony other than Chinese; with reference to the burden of proof it is also justifiable. It is a familiar principle that the party who has in his possession the best evidence must produce it upon demand. A Chinaman defends himself by say-ing: "You can not deport me because I have a good excuse for nonregistration." If so, he must establish that fact. It is impossible for this Government to prove the contrary at the outset. If every Chinaman in California is presumed to have registered, or if he concedes that he did not register, if he is presumed to have a good excuse for nonregistration it will be impossible for the Government ever to make a case for deportation against a Chinaman.

If, in defiance of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the If, in defiance of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, you treat this as penal legislation, if you declare that it is in effect the enactment of a penal statute, and that the Chinaman is entitled to the presumption of innocence so called as to each and every proposition necessary to be established in order to justify his deportation, then he must be presumed to be a person exempt from liability to deportation, and this presumption can not be reputted no matter whet the previte many her tion can not be rebutted no matter what the merits may be.

When once the certificate provided for by this statute has been given to a Chinaman he has in his pocket the very best evidence that he can have and the best evidence that exists of his right to be in the country, and he can readily supply it. There is no disgrace in the photograph requirement of this bill. Is it a disgrace to have our photographs taken? Have not Senators at some time in their lives been proud and happy when asked for a photograph? Is it not a fact that some candidates for office occasionally send photographs about for the purpose of exhibiting their features? Is it not true throughout all the avenues of business, over which to-day travel the most enter-prising and energetic of our people, that the photograph is used by the man who wishes to make himself known?

In our daily transactions we subject ourselves to personal descriptions. I have in my pocket a railroad ticket which I bought in Los Angeles for the round trip from that city to Washington, and thence to California, and upon which ticket, by means of certain designations made by punching the ticket, I am described. I never thought of saying to the railroad corporation selling the ticket that it had no authority to so punch the same as to indicate whether I am tall or short, stout or otherwise; whether I am old or young, whether I have gray or black hair, or whether my head is bald. Yet they took that liberty with me, and I did not feel offended; and the Chinaman, whose tender heart seems to appeal with such effect to Senators here, is the last man on earth to be insulted because he is asked to sign his name and have his personal appearance taken down.

I have spoken to many Chinamen with reference to this registration, and they have uniformly told me that they were willing to register but that their leaders had informed them or advised them not to do so. By their leaders, they refer to the Six Companies—those wonderful organizations whose exact constitution is unknown, as far as I am aware, to any of us. To-day the Chinamen in California are, in my opinion, anxious for any opportunity to register under the provisions of this bill. They do not detect any hardship.

Primarily my disposition was to oppose the granting of any extension whatever; I believed that when the Congress of the United States had enacted a measure which was approved by the Executive, and when the supreme tribunal, whose organization fitted it for a final adjudication of the issue, have held that that legislation was valid and constitutional, it should have been enforced; but I found that the temper and desires of the majority of the American people were in favor of an extension, and I have not therefore hesitated to come here and to advocate the adoption of this bill.

I doubt whether in the second section the definition of the word "laborer" is as broad as it should be. I would rather define laborer as meaning all those who are not expressly permitted to land I would rather, perhaps, amend the bill for the purpose of perfecting it in one or two respects, but I am satisfied that in these last hours of the session there is nothing to do but to pass it as it has come here.

There is a provision that the parties may go before a United States judge, and it is my opinion that there should have been added "the judge of a Territory," it having been held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States vs. McAllister, 141 U. S., that a judge of a Territory is not a United States judge, but we shall probably be able to supplement that later on if necessity arises. Hence I have presented no amendment.

While I thoroughly agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. Squire] that there should be an appropriation to carry out the provisions of this act, yet I do not believe it advisable to submit that amendment now, for the reason assigned with reference to the other amendments. Therefore I shall vote for the bill set at and a

Let me say to those who for whatsoever reason see fit to stand here as the advocates of those people, against whom the citizens of the State of California, regardless of party and with astounding unanimity, protest that if they defeat this bill they lead the matter standing in that State thus: To-day Chinamen are in hiding, they are in the willow patches, the marshes, and in the hills seeking to avoid the enforcement of the law which is still in effect, and if those who feel friendly disposed toward the Chinese desired to do something to relieve their present condition let me remind them, in all earnestness and with the utmost sincerity, that they should at once desist from their efforts to repeal the wise legislation upon this subject heretofore passed. The enactment now desired is an extraordinarily liberal measure. When 100,000, perhaps 200,000, members of an alien race, permitted to be within the confines of this Republic, defy our laws and boldly announce that they will not obey the statute, I think they should be well satisfied if this Government permits them an opportunity to do that which they should have done long ago.

Senators speak of the imprisonment of these Chinamen. How can a man be deported unless there is some harshness used with reference to him? The necessity of his deportation being settled by the Government, and the power conceded and affirmed by the highest tribunal which may pass upon it, there remains nothing for the Government to do but to execute its well-considered edict, and in executing it, in deporting him, if the Chinaman will not go of his own motion, if he must be compelled to go, it may be that the maxim molliter manus imposmit should apply to him, but there must be some force used, as little as may be, but he must be taken; the marshal must not be required to keep him in his parlor, but when once sentenced, when once ordered deported, then the day of grace has passed and there is nothing "But you deny the right of habeas corpus," says somebody.

Where do we deny it? There is no appeal, says another. Is there anything wonderful with reference to the denial of an appeal? In some tribunal must be lodged the power to finally adjudicate every question. It is of no moment, constitutionally considered, whether in such a case as this the ultimate power is vested in a judge of the United States district court or the Supreme Court of the United States. In each case it is within the power of Congress, and if each one of these Chinamen were given an opportunity to enable the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon a simple question of fact there would arise the necessity of creating a thousand tribunals with the result that the legislation could not be enforced.

Senators speak of the danger of men being deported who should not be. What tribunal more safe than that over which a United States judge presides? If we eliminate the court, and refer to it the judge alone, nevertheless he is the same conscientious officer in whatever part of this Republic he may be. He has been selected by the President of the United States and his nomination confirmed by the Senate of the United States. The judge of a United States court has been made the arbiter with the full knowledge upon the part of Congress that in no other hands can the authority be more safely lodged; and when once a Chinaman is found unregistered, whose duty it was to register under the provisions of the act, he is subject to be deported. Then why, let me ask, should there be any further steps, any further delay, any appeal bonds, or why permit the release of one admittedly not entitled to be at large within the United States?

let me ask, should there be any further steps, any further delay, any appeal bonds, or why permit the release of one admittedly not entitled to be at large within the United States?

Some one has said an American, a white man, might be arrested under this law. Mr. President, yes, it may be that an officer of the law might take a white man and bring him before a United States judge and that the United States judge might decide him to be a Chinaman. But are we to suppose that our tribunals have become so incompetent, so foolish, so corrupt? Are we to indulge in a presumption against the officers of our Government, in whom we have ourselves lodged this power? Are we to assume that they are incapable of exercising their authority, either reasonably or honestly? There is no danger, Senators, of the abuse of power in this case. No such instance has ever arisen or will arise.

There is no disposition upon the part of the people of the State of California to misuse authority, or to ill treat Chinamen, or to do anything else than to live within the pale of the law. The people of California appealed to Congress, and not in vain, for the enactment of the measure to which this is an amendment. It was not their fault that the trouble was not settled, but it was because of the turpitude of those whose obligation it was to register; and now that they manifest a disposition to register, and while we accord them the privilege—and whether they demand it or not, it is e-rtainly a gratuity on our part—let us not he situte to incorporate in the enactment such provisions which will make it efficacious and final.

No hardship will be done. The Chinese will seek and be sought by the officers whose duty it is to register them, and they will register, placing their names and their photographs of record. No better credentials can the Chinese have to defend their right to stay within this country than the photograph and the certificate. These will constitute their protection. It will guard their interests as well as the interests of the people.

We know, notwithstanding the legislation which has been had here, that, although thousands of Chinamen have gone home, yet that population has not been reduced, and we appreciate, therefore, that the failure to reduce it under such circumstances is due necessarily to the coming into this country of Chinese who have no right whatever to be here.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] alluded to the language of the act signifying that certain Chinamen are entitled to be here, and he spoke harshly of the additional burdens imposed upon them. Shall an alien within the United States refuse to register, to give us his name if we see fit to ask it of him? Is it undue severity to solicit him to put his name of record where it may be useful to us and of benefit to him? Is there any outrage committed when going to the Republic of France the visitor finds that he must record his name? Is there anything outrageous in carrying a passport and having it inspected? Is there anything vicious in legislation which demands that when a reasonable provision is made with reference to aliens in this country that that provision shall be enforced?

This is not legislation in any manner like that to which Senators have alluded. The Jews of Russia have been expelled by an imperial order without any reference to their rights or any opportunity to perform any rational requirement giving them the privilege of remaining. The revocation of the edict of Nantes, mentioned by the Senator from Minnesota, and kindred harsh assertions of power were all peremptory mandates, unconditional and unreasonable orders inhibiting the presence of the hated individual and demanding his summary expulsion. But this nation has done no parallel act.

I am astonished that in this Chamber a Senator should rise and declare that we have enacted a law in any manner similar to those commented upon. Such statements are wholly unsupported. The power which we have invoked is the power of sovereignity. The Republic, within its own confines, guarding the welfare of hor people and discharging that trust freesived from them, and which must be well and perfectly discharged if she shall live and command the respect of man, has simply exacted of these people to do something involving no expense, but little trouble, and no disgrace. This demand of the sovereign tolerating their presence is refused and they declare they will not comply. Then, this Government, whose laws have been repudiated and whose authority has been challenged, merely says to those who have thus defied her, "No penalty shall be indicted upon you as the consequence of your willful transgressions, except this, if you will not obey my laws you shall not live within the reach of their jurisdiction." Surely no nation can be asked to harbor those who boldly refuse to acquiesce in reasonable regulations; and no nation can be called unjust if it demands that those who so refuse shall be driven without its walls. This is all that we attempt to do. How wanton, then, are the attacks made upon the friends of this

How wanton, then, are the attacks made upon the friends of this legislation.

I know an appeal has been made to us by well-meaning and charitable and honest people, representing a portion of the Christian community of this country. But these good folks do not understand the subject. Some time ago the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Dolph] very well expressed the situation of these ladies and gentlemen, and explained their want of knowledge. I wish the light of Christianity might nenetrate the Chinese beauty and are light of Christianity might penetrate the Chinese heart and control their actions, and dictate to them the proper policy to pursue, the mode of life to follow. But in spite of all that has been said to the contrary, the efforts of our missionaries have not been a success. Of the one hundred thousand Chinamen who dwell in this country, amidst our churches and our Christain influence, and our goodness, and our piety, how many are really Christians: Some of them go to Sunday-school, and their presence there was well explained by a Chinese interpreter with whom I was once acquainted. He came to my office and said, "I can not act longer for you or the county" (I was then a prosecuting officer, and had used him as an interpreter), "because I am going to China." "Well." I said, "Jim. will you return." He said, "No." Iremarked, "You are a Christian, are you not? I know you are a member of the the Rev. Mr. So-and-So's Sunday-school." He said, "Oh, yes: I am a Christian here." "Well," school." He said, "Oh, yes: I am a Christian here." "Well," I said, "when you get back to China, will you not be a Christian there?" "Oh, no," he responded, "you know there are not many Christians in China, but this is a Christian country, and I like to do everything here that the Christians do. I am a Christian here, but when I go back to China, of course, I shall be the same as the Chinese are there." So that his theory was that religion was a kind of state institution, which it was his duty as rather a good-natured man to follow while he was here, and especially, in consideration of observing it, he was able to get an education, enabling him to speak the English language.

ducation, enabling him to speak the English language.

In all my experience, as I have said—and I have had a good deal of it—I have never been able to find a solitary Chinaman who, in my opinion, was a bona fide Christian.

When journeying here the other day from the city of Los Angeles I met a very estimable gentleman from Massachusetts, a member of the Episcopal Church, and he told me that he had gone to school in New England many years ago with a bright young Chinaman, who had been graduated and who remained in this country and studied law for some years, and was a member this country and studied law for some years, and was a member of a Christian denomination. He went to church here very regularly. The gentleman with whom I was conversing said he heard from the Chinese student soon after his arrival in China; that there he withdrew his claim to Christianity and resumed his ancient practices and donned his antediluvian garb. the reason may be I do not pretend to state. My trust is that at some date the Almighty will enlighten these people, but I do some date the Almighty will enlighten these people, but I do not wish that my life and the lives of those whom I am here to represent shall pass away waiting, waiting, waiting for Divine interposition to make possible that policy which is advocated by the opponents of this bill. I have faith that the change will come, but I do not desire that my fellow-citizens shall be offered up as sacrifices, and unwilling ones at that, while we are pausing for the accomplishment of a miracle. It is our plain duty to leavisly a upon matters as they stand.

legislate upon matters as they stand.

I do not regard as sufficient to control our action the glowing protests of those gentlemen who, standing upon a lofty pedestal and free from the presence of the Chinese curse and speaking of the rights of man, seek to instruct California as to the propriety of her conduct. If I could present some of these distinguished gentlemen and their constituents with twenty-five or fifty thousand Chinamen, I would fold my cloak and watch with confidence that, so far as they are concerned, the problem would soon be solved, and that among them I would find my most enthusiastic allies. There is evidently a want of education upon this topic.

This is not a party question in California, or the suggestion of any clique, of any creed, or of any class of men. It is the universal judgment of an intelligent people. One hundred and fifty-four thousand votes against eight hundred upon a secret ballot constitute an expression the like of which can not be rewith this before us, with the knowledge which we of the coast ss, we, the representatives of that section, appeal to the Senate and to Congress, to those who occupy a common vantage ground, we appeal to them to do that justice which we should do if we were in their position; to treat us as brethren entitled to their active cooperation in our struggle of self-defense.

Senators refer to the possible conduct of China in relation to our missionaries. She will not, Mr. President, take any course our missionaries. She will not, Mr. Fresident, take any course differing from that already adopted because of this measure. I am willing, speaking for myself, that she should ask our missionaries in China to register and present their photographs. What an outrage would thus be perpetrated on the missionary who has gone forth prepared to die, ready to be tied to the stake or sliced by the well-known Chinese slicing process? Would he not be willing to stipulate that in lieu of the dangers which he supposed he wight meet he should be called upon to sign his supposed he might meet, he should be called upon to sign his name and give a photograph?

We hear that there is danger that China may retaliate, and we are told "Do unto others as you would have others do unto you." Yes, Mr. President, let China require every American within her walls to register and present his photograph, and I do not believe one will be found to object. Our missionaries will not defy the law of China, and China will, in that event, have done to them just as we are doing to her subjects, and no American will be silly enough to protest against the regulation.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if it is not true that every American citizen in China is compelled to not true that every American citizen in China is compelled to register in some manner?

Mr. WHITE of California. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DOLPH. And are not American citizens obliged to take out some evidence of their right to stay there?

Mr. WHITE of California. I understand so; but I am speaking of the special provisions of the pending bill. My understanding is, though I am not prepared to give the terms of the order, that much more stringent measures are enforced in China than here in that regard.

The Chinamen at the World's Fair, one of whose certificates I have in my pocket, have not found it very difficult to register and present their photographs. I hold in my hand Mr. Wee Hay's card and his photograph and the various tickets appended thereto. He is an actor, a professional man, and he has not objected to furnishing his photograph so far as I have heard. In fact there is not, as I said before, a single Chinamen in the State of California who on personal grounds objects to this proposition.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate further. I have made these remarks because it has seemed to me that opposing Senators have not presented this question upon its real merits, and that they have misconceived the attitude of California and of the inhabitants of that State. It appears to me that if Senators resided on the Pacific coast for even a brief period their sentiments would be identical with those of their own flesh and blood who, brought into immediate contact with this repellant influence, have made the demands which I am attempting to enforce. The legislation proposed is wise, necessary, just. The criticisms which I have sought to answer are the outcome of a total misapprehension of the matter, and the disasters suggested will prove entirely imaginative.

will prove entirely imaginative.

Mr. CALL, Mr. President, I do not wish to make any speech.

I merely wish to make an explanatory remark. I wish to say for myself that I am perfectly willing to vote for a law which will allow the State of California to prohibit any Chinamen from living in the State and deporting every one of those there, with reasonable limitations as to the protection of property and the light of power. rights of person.

Mr. WHITE of California. Does the Senator think that can be done now? Mr. CALL.

I do. Mr. WHITE of California. I am afraid it would not stand.

We have tried that.

Mr. CALL. I wish to read section 9 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, which provides as follows:

The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808.

That clearly recognizes the authority of Congress to prohibit the migration or importation of persons admitted by the States after that period of time. It also recognizes, with equal clearness, the power of the States after that time to permit the mi-gration or prohibit it, Congress not exercising its power. Why can not the State of California, if it is so anxious to prohibit any Chinaman from ever landing upon her soil, procure an enactment by Congress allowing the State of California to prohibit the migration of persons into that State? That clause of the Constitution clearly recognizes the power. Why can they not ask for a treaty with China which shall permit Chinamen of certain classes to come here, but not to enter into the States prohibiting their immigration or residence? I can see no reason

My principal object in rising, however, was to say that, in my judgment, this is not a question which concerns California alone. It is perfectly feasible that California shall protect herself entirely from Chinese immigration and residence here, as I have shown, but it is to be considered, not that these 350,000,000 people, or perhaps five or six hundred million people, shall be judged in regard to their entire character by a few thousand vicious people of that country in the city of San Francisco, and their whole past and future history condemned because less than fifty thousand people in the State of California, or anywhere else, exhibit vices of the most abandoned and depraved nature.

I wish to ask that an extract from a book written by George F. Seward, late United States minister to China, on the subject of Chinese character may be incorporated in my remarks. The extract referred to is as follows:

Henevolence and good faith, which are quite subordinate in the heathen systems of the West, in that of China, are each promoted to the leadership of a grand division. In fact, the whole tone of Chinese morals, as exhibited in the names and order of their cardinal virtues, is quite consonant with the spirit of Christianity. Benevolence leads the way in prompting to positive efforts for the good of others; justice follows to regulate its actions; wisdom sheds her light over both; good faith imparts the stability necessary to success; politeness, or a sense of propriety, by bringing the whole conduct into harmony with the fitness of things, completes the radiant circle.

In the year 1800 the whole population of the State was 379,994. That of the Chinese was 34,933.

The Chinese population then was something less than 1 in 10, while their part of the whole number of criminals was about 1 in 18.

In the year 1870-71 the whole number of prisoners was 860, including of the Chinese 118.

In 1870 the population was 560,247, including of the Chinese 49,310. Their proportion of population was then about 1 in 11, and of criminals about 1 in $7\frac{1}{2}$.

Their proportion of population was then about 1 in 11, and of criminals about 1 in 73.

Taking the table of the State's insane asylum, we find that in 1860 there were 7 Chinese inmates out of 248, and in 1870, 13 out of 562. The difference in the percentage in this direction is so great as to occasion surprise, more particularly when one remembers that the absence of women among the Chinese has a direct and positive tendency to increase forms of vice which occasion insanity.

With one further citation I shall close this chapter. Mr. Edward J. Armstrong testified that he had examined the records of the district court of the fourth district of California, at San Francisco, and that the total number of cases in that court, up to date, had been 28,824. Out of this great mass of trials he found that there were twenty-nine actions in which the Chinese were defendants, in which they were sued for breach of contract, or debt, or on promissory notes; for the foreclosure of a mortgage, one; damages for assault, one; and for malpractice there were two.

Mr. Cready

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not rise to add a word to what has been said upon this question, but to express the wish that, in view of the exigency which seems to me and to many of us to be upon the Government of the United States in dealing with these people, that we may now have a vote. I want, as one who agrees with much which has been said on this subject by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], to have this bill passed in order that those unfortunate persons of the Chinese race in-carcerated in San Francisco may be relieved from pains and confinement, and that thousands of others may be prevented.

Mr. SQUIRE. Mr. President, on reflection, after listening to the statements of the Senators from California, not only those expressed on the floor of the Senate but in private conversation, feeling it to be important that the pending bill shall pass in its present form rather than that no bill shall be passed at this series of the bedy and of the sion, and understanding the situation of this body and of the other as to the numbers who can be relied upon to be present, I have concluded not to press my amendment at this time, but to offer it as a separate bill for future legislation.

I do not intend to discuss the subject at length, but I desire to say at this point that I deem this to be a very serious matter, and simply wish to explain the reasons why I take this position.

The Chinese in the State of California and other parks of the

The Chinese in the State of California and other parts of the Pacific coast are now in hiding, and we ought to provide the means whereby they may come out of their hiding places, and may register, as I am told they are likely to do in large numbers. If this object can be obtained, I am willing to have the bill passed in its present form; but I think it is very seriously to the disadvantage of the efficacy of the law and the dignity of the Government that no appropriation has been made or will be made in ment that no appropriation has been made or will be made in this bill for carrying out the purposes and intent of the law. I think it is beneath the dignity of the Government to undertake to depend solely upon the voluntary act of the Chinese in coming to register. I believe if we had appropriated the amount of $100,000 in the pending bill, we should show by such legislation that the Government of the United States means business; that it has the power thought to deport from 1,000 to 1,500 or 2,000 that the power thereby to deport from 1,000 to 1,500 or 2,000 Chinese; and in that way we should so terrify them that there would be no delay in their coming forward to register and comply with the other requirements of the law. In this respect it is important that we should have a deterrent of that character.

But, as I said before, realizing the great importance of pass ing the bill in its present form and recognizing the appeal of other Senators from the Pacific coast, I have concluded not to press the amendment, and therefore withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington is withdrawn. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Hoar] to strike out all after section 1 of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr.

HOAR] as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. The amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts appears to be put in parts. I supposed it was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a substitute.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I have moved a substitute for the bill. It is a substitute which was prepared by a gentleman whose memorial has been printed by the Senate, who represents the missionary association, and who also understands very well the desire and opinion of the Chinese, I think. While his amendment preserves the policy of the existing law, which would not as an original policy be accepted by me, its imply provides for a method of identification and extension of time which shall not be disagreeable or humiliating to the Chinese

It is quite as efficient in my judgment as the original bill. That was proposed as a substitute. The other amendment which I proposed was to strike out a portion of the bill in the nature of an amendment, to perfect it. The two matters are entirely separate; because, under the well-known parliamentary cust most handle and the separate when there is a substitute for an entire measure both the Senate, when there is a substitute for an entire measure both it and the measure are considered as original propositions, and amendments may be offered and made as far as the second degree to either

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts in the nature of a substitute. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for a division.

The Senate proceeded to divide, and the ayes were four.

Mr. HOAR. I withdraw the call for a division.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The call is withdrawn. The amendment is rejected. The bill is still in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. WHITE of California. I have a request to make of the Senate, and I trust there will be no objection when I state the matter. I believe I have not objected to any similar favor. I desire to call up and have passed Senate bill 460, which was reported favorably from the Committee on Public Lands on the 4th of September. It is a bill granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in that State. As the matter stands California is the only one of the public-land States which has not had such legislation. A similar bill in the same words was passed at the last session of the last Congress by this body, and it has been favorably re-ported in three Congresses in the other House. I think there can be no objection to it.

can be no objection to it.

Mr. CULLOM. Has such a bill passed the other House?

Mr. WHITE of California. No, sir; it has been reported favorably, I say, for three Congresses in the other House. It passed the Senate in the last Congress, but was not considered in the House of Representatives, owing to want of time.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator again state the object of the

Mr. WHITE of California. It is a bill granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in that State. California is the only public land State regarding which similar legislation has not been passed. There are, I think, twelve or thirteen States concerning which the same action has been taken. The Committee on Public Lands has reported the bill unanimously at the present session as at other sessions.

Mr. HOAR. It was reported by a committee of the Scnate at the present session?

WHITE of California. Yes, sir; by the Committee on Public Lands, of which the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from California for the present consideration of the bill indicated by him?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 460) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash gales of public lands in said State, which was read, as follows:

sales of public lands in said State, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, dc., That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of the public lands which have been heretofore made by the United States since the admission of said State, or may hereafter be made in said State, to aid in the support of the public or common schools of said State; and the sum of money necessary to pay said 5 per cent to said State is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SETTLERS ON INDIAN LANDS IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time the bill (S. 131) making an appropriation to pay the damages resulting to the persons who went upon the Crow Creek and Winnebego Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, between the 17th day of February and the 27th day of April, 1885. The bill was reported unanimously from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

It has been recommended by the Interior Department, and is unanimously reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs after thorough consideration. desire to have read at the desk a letter from the Interior Department with regard to this matter.

Mr. WALTHALL. I should like to ask the Senator from South Dakota if this is a House bill or a Senate bill?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is a Senate bill.

Mr. WALTHALL. What advantage can there be in passing ithrough the Senate at this late hour of the session? It is a very important bill and I object to its further consideration.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I hope to get it through the other House early in December, if possible. It is very important that it should go there soon.

Mr. BATE. How large an appropriation is involved?
Mr. PETTIGREW. The bill proposes to appropriate not to

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, November 2, 1893.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement in regard to my colleague, Mr. WRIGHT, who was unavoidably In response to a telegraphic message from absent yesterday. him I secured, or thought I had secured, a pair for him on the silver-purchase repeal bill. I was so informed at the desk, but I see that in the RECORD this morning no pair for Mr. WRIGHT is announced. I desire, therefore, to say that had he been present he would have opposed recommitting the bill, and would have voted to concur with the Senate in the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 8d day of November present at 8 o'clock p. m.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this is debatable for thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. It is, if any gentleman desires to debate it. Does the genleman from Indiana desire to be heard?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do, for a moment. I regret very much that this resolution has been brought into the House, especially in its present form. If there must be a vacation in Congress, why not a recess? I think it is quite obvious that the House ought to consider the propriety of taking a recess instead of adjourning. If the House should take a recess until, say, II o'clock on the first Monday of next December, all the committees of the House, if they desire to do so could continue at work tees of the House, if they desire to do so could continue at work exercising the powers they possess under the rules and under the various resolutions which have been adopted.

A resolution has been passed conferring upon the Committee on Appropriations power to sit during the daily sessions of the House and in vacation, I think, but I am not aware that any such power has been conferred upon any of the other commit-tees; and I think that the Committee on Ways and Means, for instance, should have authority to continue in session, exercis-ing its general powers during the interval between now and the beginning of the regular session, so that consideration of the tariff may be commenced at the earliest day possible.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I think that authority has been given.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Ohio suggests that such authority has been given. I am not aware of it. Perhaps the that notify has been given. I am not aware of it. Perhaps the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means can inform the House whether any action has been taken on that subject. If not, I take it for granted that a resolution that the Ways and Means Committee shall have authority to sit during the vacation of the House, if an adjournment takes place, will require unanimous consent. I hope this will be considered in advance.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think consent has already been given for both the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not see the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means present, but perhaps some member of that committee will inform the House whether permission has been granted for it to sit in the absence of Congress in case of adjournment. In case of recess of course all committees can be in session.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. What has that to do with the question of adjournment? Mr. HOLMAN. It has this to do with it, that if a recess is taken instead of an adjournment the committees can go on and

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The House will certainly give that committee authority to sit during the interval.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I think that would require unanimous

Mr. TURNER. I did not quite understand the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana; but if he will yield to me I will ask him whether it related to the sessions of the Ways and Means Committee during the vacation?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; that was my inquiry.
Mr. TURNER. I am not aware, Mr. Speaker, that any such permission has yet been asked by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, but I am quite sure that he intends to ask it, if he has not already done so.

Mr. HOLMAN. But will not that require unanimous consent?

Mr. TURNER. Iam inclined to think that the House can grant that leave without unanimous consent, but I have no idea that anybody will object to granting it. I would not like, however, anybody will object to granting it. I would not like, however, to move in the matter in the absence of the chairman of the committee. I see the gentleman from West Virginia now in his seat. [To Mr. WILSON:] The gentleman from Indiana desires to know whether the Committee on Ways and Means has obtained leave to sit during the vacation.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It has not; but it is my purpose to ask that permission of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I would like to ask my friend from West Virginia a parliamentary question, whether that authority West Virginia a parliamentary question, whether that authority can be given except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I am not prepared to answer that question. It is rather a question for the Chair to

Mr. HOLMAN. It may be, of course, that no gentleman will take the responsibility of objecting. I hope none will, but it may be done.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I do not suppose that anybody will object. Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know that any one will desire to take that responsibility, but I feel very confident that the House ought to take a recess instead of an adjournment. ought to take a re

A MEMBER. Why?

Mr. HOLMAN. For very obvious reasons.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Has the gentleman considered the question of economy in connection with the matter?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have. That is what I am looking to as one feature of the situation, but I am considering whether the committees can get business in readiness for the regular session.

committees can get business in readiness for the regular session.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think that if we should adjourn now we would be entitled to a second milesge at the opening of the regular session?

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe we would not. I hope not.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is not that in your mind?

Mr. HOLMAN. I apprehend an argument which will be indulged in when we meet in December, if we should adjourn now, and I know that argument will have no force if we take a recess, but I was not considering that matter.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. We had better adjourn, then

We had better adjourn, then. WILSON of Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The clerk hire will continue to run if we take a rece Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. HOLMAN. I know there will be some expenditure con-nected with the House remaining in recess, but it amounts to little in consideration of other matters.

I only want to call the attention of the House to the fact that an adjournment means substantially two sessions of Congress instead of one, and suspends the committees. It means a called session and a regular session, whereas a recess would have exactly the reverse effect.

I will not occupy the time of the House further, as there seems to be a general drift of sentiment in favor of an adjournment. I regret that an adjournment must take place for reasons

I have named.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.
Mr. HOLMAN.

Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Do you think it is necessary either to take a recess or to adjourn? Don't you think it would be better to go on and work?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNOD-GRASS] submits a question which I think might well receive the earnest consideration of the House, and I hope there will be a division upon this question. I submit to gentlemen that the saving of a month in the latter part of next year would be a for-tunate event for Congress and for the country. If Congress should be able to adjourn by the 1st of next July, or the 1st of next August, all gentiemen can see that it would not only be beneficial to members but beneficial to the country. It would enable gentlemen to explain to their constituencies the character of the legislation passed by Congress, which may be a very important matter. We are now here at a season of the year most favorable for legislation, and why not go on with the business of the country and complete it as soon as possible?

Mr. BLAND. I suppose Wall street has no further use for us. Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is there a single prominent committee of the House which has any important business ready for the House? What will we do if we remain here? The Committee on Indian Affairs, the Appropriations Committee, the Committhe on Ways and Means, and the other important committees of the House have as yet considered none of the appropriation bills which we will have to consider at the regular session. Mr. HOLMAN. They will all have some estimates in the course of a short time which they can consider, and, in fact, I understand some estimates have already been presented to the Appropriations Committee.

A MEMBER. They can work on them during the recess.

Mr. HOLMAN. They have the right to work during the recess, I admit, but are not authorized to sit when Congress stands

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to

Mr. SAYERS.

ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman has stated that the Committee on Appropriations have some estimates.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood so.

Mr. SAYERS. We have no estimates that can be considered except a few deficiency estimates.

Mr. HOLMAN. Isupposed there were some estimates already in in regard to the legislative appropriation bill.
Mr. SAYERS. Those are merely proof sheets.
Mr. OUTHWAITE. The Committee on Military Affairs have

mr. OUTHWAITE. The Committee on Military Affairs have no estimates whatever for their appropriation bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] says the Committee on Appropriations have only proof sheets of the estimates. The proof sheets are just the same to work upon as the regular report. They are simply advanced proofs.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The Committee on Military Affairs have received no proof sheets even; no estimates of any kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. There will be a large number of estimates sent in very soon, so that the committee of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] is chairman, as well as the Committee on Indian Affairs and other committees, will be able to resent business to the House in a very short time. I hope the House will continue at work. If we must have a vacation, let us take a recess instead of an adjournm .nt.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. Generally I am in harmony with the gentleman, who is a vigilant legislator and who wants to utilize all the time. It would please me very greatly to be in harmony with him on this occasion, but under the circumstances I can not. It seems to me the best interests of the country would be subserved by the longest adjournment, and I think it is only unfortunate that we can not now adjourn this Congress without day. [Laughter.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansus [Mr. TERRY].

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I am decidedly of the opinion that this House should continue in session. We are here and we ought to stay here; and I submit to gentlemen on this side

Mr. WASHINGTON. Have you been here all the time during the special session?

Mr. TERRY (continuing). I submit whether or not we should adjourn, or take a recess at all, until we have attended to the important business for which we were sent here.

It may be, sir, that the Committee on Ways and Means and the other important committees of the House that have been named here are not ready to make reports of business for our consideration. But is that the only legislation that Democracy for years has promised to the people of the United States? Here are Territories, sir, knocking at the doors of Congress for admission. Is not our party pledged that they should be admitted? Where are your immigration laws your new invitation laws. Where are your immigration laws, your navigation laws, your laws to restore the American flag to the highway of the intions? Have you never said anything about them? Why not go ahead and transact some of the important legislation to which our party is committed? I hope, when the question is submitted to their judgment, gentlemen on this side of the Chamber at least will consider well before voting in favor of the adoption of this reso-

Subsequently, Mr. TERRY said: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of per-

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TERRY. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I have been advised by friends that in the course of my remarks in opposition to the adjournment resolution submitted a few minutes ago, a to the adjournment resolution submitted a few minutes ago, a gentleman on the floor asked the question how long I had been here during the special session. I did not catch his question at the time and now desire, in justification to myself, to state in the presence of the House that I have been here every day and every hour during the session of the House, except when I was necessarily compelled to be in attendance at the bedside of my sick children, who were down with that most dreadful of all secondary to children displacement. That is all desirate and scourges to children, diphtheria. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say only a few words in support of this resolution. If there was any business on the Calendars of the House reported by its committees ready for the consideration of the House there would be much force in the suggestion that we should neither take a recess nor an adjournment at this time. But as a matter of fact there is no business of pressing importance on the Calendars of the House.

The estimates from the Departments have not come in yet, on which the Appropriation Committees can act, and the Ways and Means Committee, we are advised, will have no legislation to suggest to the House before the 1st of December.

The committees, sir, have not been working with the idea of continuous session. We were called in special session for a a continuous session. special purpose. That purpose has been accomplished, and the committees have been looking forward constantly to the day when that legislation would be terminated and a recess or an adjournment take place; and this is true also with reference even to the private business before the committees. There has been practically no committee work in that regard; and I only state what is known to everybody, that the Calendars of the House show no business ready for action at this time to justify Congress remaining in session.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: Do you not think that to take recesses for three days at a time, and let the committees get to work, will enable them to furnish the House with enough business to con-

Mr. CATCHINGS. I doubt it very much.
Mr. BLAND. There is already a big bill on the Calendar, the bankruptcy bill. There is another bill, the merchant marine bill, and other matters, but I do not suppose that measures of this kind Wall street cares enough about to keep Congress in

Mr. CATCHINGS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Missouri could only get the name of Wall street out of his heart he would be much happier and would be much more effective on the floor of the House than he is. It seems absolutely astonish-ing that no gentleman can get up here and discuss the simplest question that can be presented without having Wall street thrust constantly into his ears. For one I am very tired of it. Now, I desire to say this, that we were called here in the middle of the summer. Gentlemen had not made their arrange-middle of the summer. Gentlemen had not made their arrangements to enter on a long session of Congress. It was not expected. It is therefore absolutely important that they should have an opportunity to go to their homes and arrange their business, so that they will be prepared to enter on the long and arduous duties which will devolve upon them when the next session of Congress begins. This, with the other considerations I have suggested, makes it appropriate that the House should adjourn.

I ask a vote on the resolution. Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman arrow his to ask a question?
Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.
Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Is there any possibility of getting a tariff bill in for consideration if we remain in session?
Mr. CATCHINGS. None whatever.
Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Then I favor adjournment.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have in my hand the Calendar of the House, and I find on it nearly a page of business reported from the committees and placed on the Calendar of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Here is a page of business on the House Calendar ready for action, and here are some three, or about three, pages of private business, with some ejectal orders. It seems to me that we ought to go on with the public husiness by continuing in session and not adjourn. It seems lic business by continuing in session and not adjourn. It seems decidedly more important that we should attend to the public business rather than to the private business which my friend from Mississippi seems to place in advance as of more impor-

from Mississippi seems to place in advance as of more importance than the public business.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have done nothing of the sort.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It seems to me we ought to attend to the public business first. I am in favor of going on with the public business now, and our private business will be more important about next June or July or August than it is now in the month of November. We will all be very much concerned in our private matters about that time, and we will want to be at home looking after them. I insist that we ought to attend to the public business now and look after our private business next summer, in the dog days.

business next summer, in the dog days.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote upon the resolution.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Let the resolution be again reported.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. Several Members. Let us have the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were-yeas 135, nays 83, not voting 135; as follows: YEAS-135.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.
Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution just passed was agreed to, and I move to table that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] submits a resolution which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE RECESS.

The resolution of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia was read. It provided that the Committee on Ways and Means have leave to sit during the interval between the first and second sessions of the Fifty-third Congress, with leave to file reports, etc.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I object to it, because it is entirely unsuitable that we should have reports without an opportunity for proper resolution and consideration. I want to state that we are an examination and consideration. I want to state that we are entirely ignorant of what the intentions on the other side have been and are up to date. We ought to have a fair, decent opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

CORRECTION OF RULES.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I present a report from the Committee on Rules, to make one or two corrections in the

The SPEAKER. The House will please give its attention. There are one or two corrections in the rules suggested, and if the House desires to make them it should make them now, so as to afford an opportunity to have them corrected in the Digest. The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 35 of Rule XI, by inserting between the word "reform" and he word "civil" the words "in the;" so as to read: "to reform in the civil Amend clause 6 of Rule XXIII, by inserting between the word "the" and the word "committee," in the first line the words "House or the;" so as to ad: "The House or the committee may by a vote of the majority of the embers present." etc.

members present," etc.

Amend clause 4 of Rule XXIV, by striking out the words "unfinished business;" and also by striking out the words "House and the state of the

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, the first amendment suggested is to clause 35 of Rule XI, which provides as to the powers and duties of committees. The words "in the" were omitted in designating the Committees on Reform in the Civil Service. The second amendment is in clause 6 of Rule XXIII. It is that clause which provides that debate on an amendment or a paragraph may be closed. It provides that it may be done by the House or It provides that it may be done by the House in the committee. The amendment simply inserts the words,

"House or the."

Mr. REED. What change is there?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It simply provides that which has already been held to be the rule, that the House may limit debate as well as the committee in Committee of the Whole by inserting the words "House or the."

Mr. DINGLEY. That is after the debate under the five-minute rule has proceeded.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is after the debate has proceeded under the five-minute rule.

Mr. REED. Has not that always been the rule of the House. Mr. OUTHWAITE. It has not been so expressed in the rule, but it has been so held.

Mr. REED. I do not see how it could be otherwise. However, I have no objection to making it declare it clearly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. This makes it clear.

Mr. REED. The House ought to have control of all committees, except perhaps the Committee on Rules. [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The other amendment is in clause 4 of Rule XXIV, which provides as to business considered during the morning hour, and strikes out the words "as unfinished business." Under this clause, when any proposition shall have occupied two hours, it thereafter has to remain on the Calendar as unfinished business. As we have no calendar of unfinished business, the expression was unnecessary. It is therefore suggested that it be stricken out.

Mr. REED. Now, the effect of that change will be to give the House another chance to debate a bill for two hours if the committee chooses to call it up.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I do not know that that is the effect of it. We have no calendar of unfinished business. The Chair held a few days ago that a committee might subsequently call up a bill which had already been considered during two hours on the call of the committee

Mr. REED. Now, if this proposed change is made I think it would be unfortunate—
Mr. OUTHWAITE. It does not change the ruling at all. Mr. REED. If you change the ruling it will be unfortunate.
Mr. OUTHWAITE. It does not change the rule.
Mr. REED. It is your impression that it will not change the ruling; but the committee will be allowed to revive temporarily some bill in order that it may have two more hours' existence and possibly live forever.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The Chair has already decided that a com-

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The Chair has already decided that a committee has authority to call up a bill under those circumstances.
Mr. REED. And you understand that that will make no change in that regard?
Mr. OUTHWAITE. It will not.
Mr. REED. Then you think that it will prevent that rather illogical condition which exists in the rule?
Mr. OUTHWAITE. Exactly.
Mr. DINGLEY. If you strike out the words "unfinished business" it will leave every bill that, in the consideration hour, has had two hours' consideration to take its place on the Calendar on had two hours' consideration to take its place on the Calendar on which it formerly stood, to be taken up in the hour, and that it shall not be considered as unfinished business, so that it does change the rules very materially.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. So far as consideration of the bill is concerned, it does not change it one particle, the ruling of the Chair a few days ago being that the committee could call a bill up on a subsequent call of that committee.

Mr. DINGLEY. The practice has been changed, so that, instead of going onto the Calendar of Unfinished Business, it may be called up in the morning hour.

That was changed when the ruling was Mr. OUTHWAITE. made a few days ago under the proviso. The proviso reads:

That when the hour herein prescribed shall expire while the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is considering a bill, the committee shall rise without a motion therefor.

The words stricken out are, "on the state of the Union", so that when the Committee of the Whole, or the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, is considering a bill and the hour expires, the committee shall rise without any mo-

Mr. REED. So that it applies to Fridays as well as to other days?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes.
Mr. DINGLEY. Did the committee take into consideration the propriety of amending this paragraph so as to confine the the propriety of amending this paragraph so as to confine the consideration of bills in the morning hour to public bills?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It did not. That was taken into consideration at the beginning of the session, when the change was made permitting private bills to be considered.

Mr. DINGLEY. So that the committee propose to allow private bills to be called up in the morning hour?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Yes, for the present, until we see whether it works any serious abuse. So far no abuse has resulted from the rule.

Mr. ENLOE. Does this authorize the calling up of bills in the morning hour on Fridays? Does it make any change in the rule in regard to business on Fridays?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It does not.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. OUTHWAITE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OPENING OF THE CHEROKEE STRIP.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, pursuant to House resolution dated September 28, 1893, information relative to the opening of the Cherokee Strip; which was referred to the Committee on Mili-tary Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

DANIEL CHASE VS. THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings of the court in the case of Daniel Chase vs. The United States; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

BRIDGES ON FORT LARAMIE RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House an act (S. 591) to donate to the county of Laramie, Wyo., certain bridges on the abandoned Fort Laramie military reservation, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

DIGEST OF INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (S. R. 37) to provide for the printing of a history and digest of the international arbitrations to which the United States was a party, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

UNITED STATES COURTS, SOUTH DAKOTA

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. 2799) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of South Dakota, with amendments of the Senate thereto.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, that is the bill, I believe, which I asked yesterday to have remain on the Speaker's table. The SPEAKER. The Chair was informed that the differences had been adjusted, and that it was desired that the bill should be laid before the House.

Mr. OATES. I was about to say that I have had a conference with one of the Senators and one of the Representatives from that State and find that the bill is satisfactory, and therefore I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The amendments of the Senate are as follows:

worth."

Page 1, line 19, after "Standing Rock," insert "and."

Page 1, lines 19 and 20, strike out "Lower Brule and Crow Creek."

Page 3, line 11, after "court," insert "all grand and petit juries for the circuit and district courts shall be drawn by the clerk of the circuit court, and all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be residents of such division."

The amendments were concurred in.

SECTION 407 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a bill for reference to the joint commission, and I ask that that commission may have leave to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R.—) to amend section 407 of the Revised Statutes, requiring decists of receipts with the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Deartment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection this bill will be referred to the joint commission with leave to report at any time.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PRIZE WINNERS' EXPOSITION, NEW YORK.

Mr. FTTCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, being H. R. 4015, in aid of the World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition to be held at New York City

The bill was read, as follows:

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all articles which shall be imported from foreign countries for the sole purpose of exhibition at said exposition, upon which there shall be a tariff or customs duty, shall be admitted free of payment of duty, customs fees or charges, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, and all articles which have been imported from foreign countries, and which are now on exhibition at the World's Columbian Exposition at Chicago, upon which there is a tariff or customs duty, and which have been heretofore admitted free of payment of duty, customs fees or that ges, may under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be removed to the city of New York, in the State of New York for the sole purpose of exhibition at said World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition.

SEC. 2. That it shall be lawful, at any time during such exposition, to sell for delivery, at the close of the exposition, any of the goods or property imported for and actually on exhibition in the exposition buildings or on its grounds, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and for the collection of the import duties as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That all such articles, when sold or withdrawn for consumption in the United States, shall be subject to the duty, if any, imposed apon such articles by the revenue laws in force at the date of the importation; and all penalties prescribed by law shall be applied and enforced against be or withdrawal thereof.

SEC. 3. That all of the provisions of public resolution numbered 30, en-such articles and against the persons who may be guilty of any illegal sale or withdrawal thereof.

SEC. 8. That all of the provisions of public resolution numbered 30, entitled "Joint resolution authorizing foreign exhibitors at the World's Columbian Exposition to bring to this country foreign laborers from their respective countries for the purpose of preparing for and making their exhibits," approved August 5, 1892, are hereby extended to and made applicable to said World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition to the same extent as if said World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition was therein specifically named.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the right to olearn more about the bill.

Mr. FITCH. I ask that the report be read. I reserve the right to object until I can

The report (by Mr. Cockran) is as follows:

The Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4015) "in aid of the World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition, to be held at New York City" from and after November 24, 1893, to January 15, 1894, re-

Mr. FITCH. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me to explain the purport of the bill. It does for New York precisely what was done for San Francisco; the provision is the same word for word.

Mr. KILGORE. What is to be done under the bill?

Mr. FITCH. Nothing is to be done ender the old?

Mr. FITCH. Nothing is to be done, except that these goods are to retain the same status as now and to be exhibited in New York. If sold, they will pay duty; if not, they will be allowed to be returned. This is only doing for New York what was done for Chicago and San Francisco.

Mr. KILGORE. How much will the Government have to pay

Mr. FITCH. Nothing at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman to amend by inserting such a provision.

Mr. FITCH. Will the gentleman suggest the amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. "That no liability shall be incurred against the Government of the United States under this provision."

Mr. FIICH. I accept that amendment, of course.
The SPEAKER. Where does the gentleman desire the amendment to come in.

Mr. HOLMAN. At the end of the bill.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows: Insert at the end of the bill the words:
"Provided, That no liability shall be incurred by the Government of the United States."

Mr. FITCH. That is accepted.

The amendment was agreed to.

CHOCTAW COAL AND RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 299) to extend the time for the construction of the railway of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company and to confer additional powers upon said company.
The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Be tt enacted, etc., That the time for the construction of the railway of the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, which, by the provisions of the act approved February 21, 1891, entitled "An act to amend an act authorizing the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to construct a road through the indian Territory," will expire February 18, 1894, shall be extended for a period of three years from that date, so that said company shall have until February 18, 1897, to construct the lines of railway authorized by the act approved February 18, 1888, entitled "An act to authorize the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," and the act amendatory thereof, approved February 13, 1898, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the Choctaw Coal and Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, approved February 18, 1898," and for such purpose the said company shall have the right to take and occupy the right of way and depot grounds hereofore granted to it by said acts.

The committee recommended the following amendments: In line 11 of section 1, strike out the word "three" and insert "two;" and in line 13 strike out the work "seven" and insert the word "six."

Also strike out sections 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are, I believe, three additional sections of that bill which have not been read, and I understand they have been stricken out.

PERSONNEL OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MEYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER protempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee in the chair). The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are constantly before Congress numerous bills dealing with the question of rank and pay in the Navy, and other matters concerning the personnel of the same: and
Whereas the present laws relating to this subject are in many instances imperfect, inconsistent, unjust, and the result of piecemeal legislation: Therefore, be it Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a special joint committee, consisting of three members of the House and three members of the Senate, be appointed respectively by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to fully investigate and consider the entire subject of the rank, pay, and all other matters relating to the personnel of the Navy; to have power to send for persons and papers, sit during the recess, if any, and during the stiting of both Houses, and to report at any time after it convenes as may be convenient what legislation, if any, is necessary in the premises: any bill so reported by them shall simplify, codify, and revise existing laws relating to the personnel of the Navy so far as may be found possible. REGULATION OF STEAM VESSELS.

The SPEAKER protempore. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 2377) to amend "An act to amend section 4400 of Title LII of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam vessels, proved August 7, 1882; and also to amend section 4414, Title LII, of the Bevised Statutes, "Regulation of steam vessels;" which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DAM ACROSS THE KANSAS RIVER.

Mr. BLANCHARD, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, reported back favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 340) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River, within Shawnee County, in the State of Kansas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

BIRMINGHAM, SHEFFIELD AND TENNESSEE RIVER RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HALL of Missouri, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 198) to grant to the Birmingham, Sheffield and Tennessee River Railway Com-pany a right of way over the public lands traversed by it; which was referred to the House Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

FORT CUMMINGS MILITARY RESERVATION. Mr. GRESHAM, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. 356) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reserve from sale certain lands in the abandoned Fort Cummings military reservation, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

CASH ENTRIES PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. SOMERS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 4244) to confirm cash entries to offered lands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill will be referred to the Union Calendar.

Mr. McRAE. I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that as this bill was recommitted by the House to the Committee on Public Lands for the purpose of obtaining certain information. tion now contained in the accompanying report, it is now privileged and entitled to immediate consideration, and should not now be referred again under the rules to any Calendar. The bill might be held on the Speaker's table until its status can be settled. I submit that the proper order would be that the bill and report be printed without prejudice to the right of consid-

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee). But the bill having been referred to a committee, and having been reported back, it ought to go to one of the Calendars.

Mr. McRAE. The bill was reported favorably to the House by the Committee of the Whole House, was amended, engrossed, and read a third time; and pending the question upon its pas sage it was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands with instructions to obtain certain in ormation as to the lands covered by the bill. It was not the purpose of the House to amend the bill, but to ascertain certain facts before called upon to vote

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But having been recommitted, it must be again reported.

Mr. McRAE. But under the rules and practice of the House, as I understand them, the bill would now take the same position in the House which it occupied when it was recommitted, and the question will be on its final passage. If there is any doubt on that question, I suggest that the bill remain on the Speaker's table until its status can be settled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that when a bill is reported in this way to the House it must go to one of the Calendars, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. McRAE. With the consent of my colleague I ask, then, that the report be withheld until the question of privilege can be considered and determined. We do not wish to lose any right by reporting now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report, then, is withdrawn for the present.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The call of committees for reports being concluded, the second morning hour, which is for the consideration of bills called up by committees, will now begin at forty-five minutes after 1 o'clock.

Mr. OATES. I ask unanimous consent that the second morning hour be dispensed with.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the unfinished business

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 139) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. OATES. I desire to have adopted a limitation of general debate on this bill. We have been liberal in this matter, allowing a large latitude of discussion. The general debate has run for seven days, and a great many gentlemen have had an opportunity to speak. I propose now that general debate be limited to three hours, to be equally divided between the two sides, although the opponents of the measure have had a little more time. than those who favor it. If there is no objection I hope that this order will be made.

The SPEAKER (Mr. CRISP having resumed the chair). The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House shall again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the bankruptcy bill general debate be limited to three hours. Is there objection? Mr. BRETZ, Mr. TERRY, and others objected.

REPORT DURING RECESS BY COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS. Mr. CATCHINGS, from the Committee on Rules, reported a resolution; which was read, as follows:

Resolved. That, immediately upon the adoption of this order, the House proceed to the consideration of the resolution authorizing the Committee of Ways and Means to stiduring the vacation of the House, which resolution is hereby reported to the House; that the previous question be considered as ordered on said resolution, and after the debate permitted by the rules, the House shall, without the intervention of other motions, proceed to you upon said resolution.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the previous question on the adoption of this resolution.

The previous question was ordered; there being upon a division (called for by Mr. REED)—ayes 76, noes 23.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised to see such a resolution as this introduced at the close of this session, because I think it is most unsatisfactory in its character and most unressourable in its derivations. most unreasonable in its demands upon the members of the Ways and Means Committee. I suppose the ground on which the demand is made is that the country may more speedily be informed of the condition of public affairs; and if I thought that in making opposition to this measure I was preventing the country from obtaining as early a knowledge as possible of all the facts which it is necessary for it to know, I should hesitate very much. But I am quite satisfied that neither will the country be more early informed, nor will the bill be really advanced by the proposition which is here presented. which is here presented.

It is an extraordinary proposition. It is that the Committee on Ways and Means shall sit sometime during the interval between now and the reassembling of the House, and during this interval shall file its results and its reports with the Clerk of the House. I think that that has never been done; at least I am not aware of it; and whether it has or has not is a matter of very little consequence. The country may have the impression that this transaction is one which is somewhat necessary; but that is beconsequence. The country may have the impression that this transaction is one which is somewhat necessary; but that is because the country does not understand how either this bill is being framed or the bill called the Mills bill was framed. The House of Representatives has committed this matter to the Committee on Ways and Means. The Committee on Ways and Means has been appointed now for nearly three months. That committee has not had a single meeting upon that subject.

The matter which has been referred to them has not been alluded to in the committee itself; in other words, instead of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives doing its duty and considering the question, representing all doing its duty and considering the question, representing all shades of belief and opinion, it has never attended to the matter the least in the world; consequently any member of this House can see that the proposition to call the Committee on Ways and Means together during the interim is simply imposing upon them an entirely unnecessary duty. If this thing goes on, as it seems to be likely to go on, the Committee on Ways and Means will have absolutely nothing to do except to record the verdict of some gentlemen at present unknown to us or to the country; and consequently they have but a formal duty. If the question were one of publicity, of informing the people what is going to take place, there is absolutely no difficulty attending it; not the least in the world.

Whenever gentlemen, whoever they may be, who are engaged in the business of making the tariff have satisfied their own powerful minds upon the subject all they have to do is to announce it to the world, and they could announce it to the world. just as readily through the newspapers as they can in any other way. That, no doubt, would be the most satisfactory way in which it could be done, so that it could be presented for criticism by the public, and the Committee on Ways and Means, who are the authorized agents of the House, would really be in a much better condition to decide upon the question and pass upon it with the various lights thrown upon it by those interested on every side of the question.

But what is the proposition now? It is that the Committee on Ways and Means shall be called together, after the good old French fashion, of which we have had so many examples, to form a bed of justice, to register the views of gentlemen at present unknown, but whose names will probably be disclosed at some That is the proposition made; and the only excuse for it is that it may hasten the matter. So far as the committee is concerned it can hasten nothing, because a new tariff bill is not going to be the result, when it is passed, of the opinion of any set of gentlemen known or unknown. It is going to be modany seconding to the carefully formed opinion of the people of this country; and they are going to have a hearing on it. They can have a hearing just as well when these gentlemen present their bill in the papers, whenever they get ready to do so.

Perhaps when the bed of justice is summened to pass upon it, that bed of justice may get some information from the people which may enable them to modify the results of the workings of these unknown gentlemen.

Haste is not what is wanted. Speed is proper; and when the committee or the subcommittee, or collection of individuals unknown, get through with the bill it will be entirely suitable that they submit it to the country without calling the committee together.

Let me present another point. The reports on both sides are That is an action which is reciprocal. The committee present their views, and when the people know what is presented to them they present to the committee their views, and these are them they present to the committee their views, and these are combined in an argument which is presented to the people of the United States on both sides. The gentlemen comprising the majority of this House have been at work, perhaps. I speak not advisedly, because there is no means of knowing anything. They may have been at work, or somebody else may have been at work; but at any rate their minds are familiar with the direc-tion that the bill is to take.

On the other hand, the minority of the committee, of whose rights the Democratic members would certainly be highly conservative, have no idea what has been going on in these secret meetings, which alone have had charge of the tariff up to the present day; and to be called here on the 20th of November, or any such time as that, and have such a bill suddenly thrust upon us, to make a report thereon, and to make it before the assembling of Congress, and to make it before it has been submitted to the people in such a short time is nothing more nor less than an utterly unsuitable thing.

Such procedure has no tendency, and will have no tendency to inform the public or to inform the members of the committee, or the minority members, whose report may possibly be as useful in giving information to the country as that of anybody else. Just a moment's consideration, Mr. Speaker, of the nature of a tariff act will resnforce what I am saying. A tariff act—I am now talking not about the terms of it, but about its essential nature-a tariff act which undertakes to meddle with a system already existing is, of necessity, very extensive in its scope, sweeping over the entire business of this country. There may be some gentlemen, whose names have not yet been disclosed to us, some gentlemen yet undiscovered, who understand this matter so thoroughly that they can in three or four days comprehend the whole

As I happen to know from the hearings which have been had in the room of the Committee on Ways and Means, there have been hundreds of people before that committee, a knowledge of the occupation of each one of whom is the work of a lifetime, and to ask us to record our views in three or four days, unenlight-ened on the subject by an expression of public opinion, or by those sources of information which are immediately presented when a bill is actually under consideration, seems to me to be unsuitable, unwise, and unreasonable. Therefore, I say that to bring in this resolution at the close of the session, under the whip and spur of the report of a committee that does not even have to have matters referred to it by the House, is something that certainly is not either suitable or proper. I reserve the rest of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has five minutes remaining. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine is right in saying that one of the objects sought by the adoption of this resolution is to give to the country as soon as may be information as to the proposed tariff legislation of this Congress. Another object is to advance the preliminary stages of that legislation on that it may be ready as soon as possible of that legislation so that it may be ready as soon as possible after the assembling of Congress for this House to enter actively upon its consideration. In view of the resolution which the House has taken to adjourn this session to-morrow, the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means felt that some such resolution as this should be passed by the House before it dispersed for this session. dispersed for this session.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is no mystery about the preparation of a tariff bill. Ever since the tariff question became a political question in this country it has been well known that when a tariff bill was under consideration it was considered as a party measure and was framed by the members of the committee belonging to the party charged with that legislation. Such was the course pursued with the Mills bill; such was the course pursued with the McKinley bill, and that is the course that must necessarily be pursued with every tariff bill so long as this is a question dividing great political parties in this country.

As soon as possible after the appointment of the Committee on Ways and Means, as soon as the legislation then before the House, which took all the time of the members of that committee, and demanded their presence upon this floor, had passed, the committee was organized and the members representing this side of the House, in response to the duty which they felt had been imposed upon them by the American people, set to work to frame a revenue measure to be presented to this House for its action. There has been no concealment of that fact. The public has been taken into the confidence of those members of the committee as far as there was anything that they could state to the public.

It has been known to the minority members of the committee that we were in session every day, in all the hours that we could escape from our duties on this floor, in a committee room of this House, and I have myself personally invited every member of that minority, with the possible exception of the gentleman from Maine, who was absent from the House for a considerable period, to drop in on us from time to time to see what we were doing, and where we were, and see how we were carrying on this work. There was no necessity for any mystery about it, and I did not desire that there should be. The gentleman from Maine is percorrect in his estimate of the magnitude of this work. Only those who have year after year been charged with labor of this kind, only those who are charged with a duty such as is now placed upon the Committee on Ways and Means, can understand how great and difficult and momentous is that work, and whatan infinite expenditure of labor, of investigation, and of patience is necessary to reach a basis of even partial satisfaction with the work which is done.

I agree with the gentleman from Maine, and I believe it is the very greatest indictment against the system of tariff legis-lation that we have had in this country for the last thirty years, that we do have to deal with occupations, with trades, and with lines of industry where a very large amount of minute technical knowledge may be necessary to deal with them as correctly as one would wish. That is an indictment of the tariff system.

It is an indictment of the protective system that such is the case, and that the most intelligent representative of the people does not come here equipped with the knowledge which pr him for that work as it may be deemed necessary from the protective standpoint.

And for that very reason gentlemen who frame protective bills have been obliged, I may say, to commit the framing of those schedules to the parties in interest, who are supposed to have that equipment of accurate technical knowledge. But, sir, men who equipment of accurate technical knowledge. represent the people of the country, men who represent the taxpayers of the country, men who represent the average in-telligence of this country, ought to be able to deal with all ques-tions of taxation in a way to do justice to the people they repre-sent and to the best interests of their whole country.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means who, if they are unknown to the gentleman from Maine can be ascertained by reference to the records of this House, have been working with fidelity, have been working with care and patience, and have welcomed assistance from every source in the preparation of a revenue bill along the lines which the American people seemed to lay out for them in their verdict at the last Presidential election. If it had been possible for us to prepare a bill for presentation to this House before this time, it would have been done; but with the care and labor necessary, we have found our best efforts not able to accomplish that result

We shall, as soon as this House disperses, be able to give to this work all the hours of the working day, and part also of the hours of the night, in order that at as early a day as possible we may present to the people of the country for their information, for their judgment, for their criticism, the result of our labors. And we desire to have this bill presented as early as possible to the American people; we desire to have it passed through the necessary committee action, the necessary parliamentary ripening, to have it ready for the action of this House as soon after it reassembles as may be practicable. And in order to secure this resultit will be absolutely necessary not only that the Dem-ocratic members of that committee shall continue their work night and day, but that there shall be lodged somewhere a power to convene the full committee to act upon such bill as the ma-jority may prepare; so that we may not be guilty of the discourtesy of communicating to the country through the press that which we shall have done before we put the fruits of our labor in the hands of our Republican colleagues upon the com-

It will be necessary, I say, that there should be lodged somewhere the authority to convene the minority of the committee, so that such a bill as may be prepared by the majority may be presented to them in the regular sessions of the committee, may be acted upon in the orderly parliamentary manner in which a committee has to act upon such measures, and that the authority may be given to file with the Clerk of this House during the reces the bill that has thus been prepared, that has thus been passed upon in the committee room, with the usual reports in favor of the bill and against it, so that as soon after the reassembling of Congress as possible this House may enter upon that which was the great duty committed to it by the American people last November. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine seems to hold the idea that the minority members of the committee will have to be enlightened by the country as to the character of the bill to be enlightened by the country as to the character of the bill before they can be prepared to make their report upon it. It seems to me that that is not what is expected of the minority members of the committee. They are supposed, by reason of their experience in this House, by reason of their experience in dealing with previous tariff bills, by reason of their knowledge of the industries of the country, by reason of the information afforded in the hearings at which they have been present before the committee; in a word, by reason of their assignment to the committee, they are supposed to be in prosession of such knowledge. committee—they are supposed to be in possession of such knowledge and such familiarity with this subject that they can take up the bill, can examine it, can in their report dissect it, and can point out to the people of the country what they suppose to be the objections to it.

So that, after all, Mr. Speaker, the whole question now before the House is whether it will take such action as may expedite the publication and consideration of this proposed tariff bill, or whether the committee shall be powerless to prepare a bill which shall be ready for the consideration of the House upon its reassembling, and we shall be obliged to go through the parliamentary stages of committee consideration, of preparation of reports, and be delayed in getting the bill upon the Calendar of the House for the information of the country and for the action of Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I feel very much obliged to the gentleman from West Virginia for some of the observations which he has been kind enough to let fall; because he not only confirmed the point which I made, but he has been so obliging as to emphasize it. He says that the members on his side of the committee have a simple course before them, not being bothered by details of business, but required only to be controlled by those simple principles which are within the knowledge of the average

That being so, and it having taken that committee three months to begin to see daylight, and we having a more difficult task, being obliged, as he admits, to have some business knowledge in order to comprehend the details of the matter, it would seem very clear that a proposition which in effect purposes to shut us off with three or four days of preparation in the making of our report is unjust in every way. The gentleman from West of our report is unjust in every way. The gentleman from West Virginia has made that very clear and patent to the country; and I am very much obliged to him, because in these questions, just as in all others, the difficulty is that the country is not able to look at matters from our standpoint. The country does desire early information with regard to this twiff bill; but it desires it because it is important to know what position shall be taken with regard to it. It is important for the country to be able to make its plans with reference to it, either for defeating it, or for modifying it, or for submitting to it as easily as possible. That I admit to be important. Nevertheless all those necessities of the case can be met by the comtheless all those necessities of the case can be met by the committee proceeding as they are now proceeding, and when they get through and are ready, submitting the result of their action to the other side and giving it to the country, because that is going to be the bill. They will not permit us to modify it; the gentleman from West Virginia has been kind enough to say so and to reiterate that this is a political bill to be passed by him and his fellow providence.

his fellow-partisans When, then, they have got the right bill ready it is not necessary, in order to inform the country, to go through the form of submitting it to the Republican members of the committee, who are really to have no voice in the transaction. So that the gentleman from West Virginia, in everything that he has said, has reenforced the argument which I addressed to the House. And I notice also, Mr. Speaker, that he did not dispute the suggestion that it would be only a short time before the beginning of the next session of Congress, before he would name his time of calling us together, and that leaves us entirely at the mercy of the chairman of a committee of the House, both as to the length of time that we shall be allowed to make our report, and as to the time that we are to be here.

Now, what the country wants is the fullest information upon this subject, not merely information as to the text of the bill, for that the gentleman from West Virginia can give to the counand give it now, as the rules stand at present, without the slightest difficulty or trouble; but it means, in addition to that, the fullest light which popular knowledge can throw upon it, condensed and presented in the form of a report to be read by the people.

We have had hearings it is true, but it is only within a day or two past that we have been able to get possession of the reports of the hearings. And here let me notice another point. I am quite sure the gentleman from West Virginia did not mean to be understood before the House or the country that we had really been invited to their councils for the examination of the tariff with the majority members of the committee; because if he did invite the minority, it would be a very singular omission that he should have selected the gentleman who had occasion to address the House first. I suppose that there may have been some jesting, pleasant talk about coming down and observing the "workings of our institutions." But this was too far under ground for us. And the gentleman will concede that he meant nothing by it, because this being a political bill, to be passed by his portion of the House, we have nothing to do with it beyond receiving it.

The idea that we are going to commence the discussion of the tariff bill at the very beginning of the next session, and have it put through the House without the country being heard on it, is perfectly absurd. It would not be wise, even if the gentleman had the power to do so, for the suggestion that it is to go through the committee stages in vacation, and then be rushed through the House at the beginning of the session of Congress, must all the country with an increased horror and a larger dissatisfaction.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the Committee on Rules.

The question was taken; and on a division, demanded by Mr. REED, there were—ayes 130, noes 1.

Mr. REED. There is a quorum present, Mr. Speaker, but it

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered, and the resolution will be recalled from the Senate.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I move a call of the House.

Mr. REED. Before that, Mr. Speaker. Can a motion to reconsider be entered in the absence of a quorum?

The SPEAKER. It must be in the power of a member to enter the motion to reconsider in the absence of a quorum, or otherwise he may be entirely deprived of the right. It must be entered on that day or the succeeding day, but, of course, action annot be taken upon it.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair be kind enough to reserve that point, so that if it is a mistake it can be corrected?

The SPEAKER. Of course. That is only an impression the Chair had.

Mr. REED. I do not in the least profess to know, because it is a question I do not remember to have ever heard raised.

The SPEAKER. Of course the Chair would be glad to be set right upon it if he is in error. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Wilson] moves a call of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of the clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the bill (H. R. 3571) to increase the number of officers of the Army to be detailed to colleges; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 45) for the relief of W. H. Ward; and A bill (S. 1021) to grant the right of way to the Kansas, Oklahoma Central and Southwestern Railway Company through Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other pur-

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Envolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 2821) for the relief of W. W. Rollins, late collector, fifth district, North Carolina, for value of stamps destroyed by fire at Winston, N. C., on November 13, 1892; when the Speaker signed the same.

REPORT DURING RECESS BY COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 42, noes 98; so the House refused to adjourn.

After a pause, Mr. MALLORY (at 6 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.). Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. HAINES (at 6 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.). Mr. Speaker,
I would like to know the reason why we are kept waiting here in this manner

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The Sergeant-at-Arms is now executing the order of the House directing him to compel the attendance of absent members.

The Sergeant-at-Arms (at 7 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) appeared at the bar of the House and said: Mr. Speaker, by virtue of the authority directed to me to arrest and bring in those members who are absent without leave, I now have at the bar of the House the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Joy] and the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CAUSEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. Joy, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. JOY: Mr. Speaker—
Mr. HALL of Missouri. I suggest that the gentleman stand up in the middle of the Hall and speak loud.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri

[Mr. JOY] is in order.
Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I really ought not to be out to-night on account of—

Mr. CARUTH. We can not hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Missouri is quite hourse.

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I can scarcely speak at all. I really ought not to be here now on account of a severe cold and sore throat. Because I am not well I was expecting not to go out this evening, but to remain at my hotel. I ask to be excused.

The SPE AKER pro tempore. The gentleman states that he was absent from the House on account of illness, and asks to be excused.

Mr. COOMBS. I move that the gentleman be excused.

The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. CAUSEY, you have been absent from the sittings of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. CAUSEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been present here the whole d.y. If you will look at the record you will find that 1 have voted on every roll call. I merely went out to get a bite, so that I could come back and stay here all night in order that the pending resolution might be passed. That is all the excuse I

Mr. DURBOROW. I move that the gentleman be excused. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that the name of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. CAU-SEY] appears on the last roll call. Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Then the officer had no right to arrest him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Delaware will be excused.

Mr. McMILLIN. If the gentleman's name appears on the roll call why was he arrested? It seems to me there can be no question about excusing him.

Mr. CAUSEY. The only reason for my arrest seems to have been that I went out to get dinner.

Mr. McMilLin. It is always important in these matters that we should do what is orderly. No member can properly be brought in under arrest unless he has been in contempt of the House. Therefore I think the gentleman should stand excused without any motion.

Mr. CARUTH. The Chair has ruled that way, I understand.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMillin].

The gentleman from Delaware is excused.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House with

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. LISLE, you have been absent from the sessions of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. LISLE. Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry to have been absent from the House to-day; but in the first place, as is known to all my colleagues, I have been in very poor health for some time. In addition to that, I have been endeavoring to-day to attend to business in the various Departments for quite a number of my constituents. I would gladly have been here in the House if I had known that my presence was of any importance.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I move that my colleague be

Mr. KILGORE. Before that question is put I would like to ake an inquiry. How did the gentleman vote on the silver quesmakean inquiry. Haughter.

The question being put on the motion to excuse Mr. LISLE, it was agreed to; there being-ayes 88, noes 0.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This question does not require

Mr. TRACEY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know whether the Chair rules that gentlemen who were here and responded on the roll call have a right to leave the Hall when the doors are ordered closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has not so ruled, but the custom is in these cases for gentlemen when they desire to be absent from the Hall temporarily, to leave their names with the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. TRACEY. They are expected to return promptly?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. SPRINGER. They leave the House on their parole; and if they violate their parole they can be rearrested. That is the practice of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Undoubtedly.
Mr. COOMBS. I rise to an inquiry. Is it in order to ask for a report from the Sergeant-at-Arms as the probability of our getting a quorum?

Mr. McMILLIN. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York, I will state that the action of the Sergeantat-Arms just taken is presumed to be a partial report, so far as he is able to make one at this time.

Mr. ENLOE. Is it not about time to issue orders to the Sergennt-at-Arms to arrest those members who went out for dinner and have not returned?

Mr. SPRINGER. . It was understood that they were to return at 7.30. It is not quite that hour yet.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the House do now adjourn.
The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 42, nocs 78.

So the House refused to adjourn.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to obtain some information either from the Chair or some member The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.
Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will make it in order, Mr.

Speaker.

I wish to ask as a parliamentery inquiry whether or not this call of the House is a serious business or whether it is a farce Mr. SPRINGER. It is a serious business of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary in-

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared before the bar of the House

The Sergeantar-Arms appeared before the bar of the House having in custody Mr. Funston.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Mr. Funston, you have been absent from the sitting of the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer therefor?

excuse have you to offer therefor?

Mr. FUNSTON. I got hungry, Mr. Speaker, and desired my dinner, and voluntarily came back, paying my own expenses.

The SPEAKER protempore. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman returned voluntarily?

Mr. FUNSTON. Yes, sir. I received netice from a page that you desired my presence up here, and I returned immediately.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I move that my colleague be excused.

Mr. ENLOE. In lieu of that I wish to make a motion. The gentleman from Kansas is an old member and understands the rules of the House. I move that the Surgeont at Arms be di rules of the House. I move that the Sargeant-at-Arms be dirules of the House. I move that the Sargeant-at-Arms be directed to deduct his pay for the day.

Mr. STOCKDALE. A point of order on that. He has not been absent all day, only a part of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas to excuse his colleague.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes S3,

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The roll was called, no quorum voting, after which the following proceedings took place:

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, Mr. DAVIS of Kansa was here until late this afternoon, and requested me, if his name was called in the evening session, to ask unanimous consent that he be excused as he was not feeling well.

Mr. HUDSON. He is sick.

There being no objection, Mr. DAVIS was excused. Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. My colleague [Mr. WRIGHT] was here until 6 o'clock, and I desire to state that he is not able on account of physical disability to remain longer.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Broderick] requested me to ask that he be excused from further attendance on account of sickness.

There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. On this question the roll call shows—ayes

9, noes 150. No quorum.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it is very apparent that there is no quorum of the other side present, and it is further evident that these interesting proceedings could be very much further prolonged, but the size of the transaction hardly seems to warrant it.

I therefore desire to propose to gentlemen on the other side the following amendment to their resolution. I propose to strike out the following words:

And may be convened by the call of the chairman. Said committee shall also be authorized to file with the Clerk of the House during this interval any bill it shall have prepared for the action of the House on the meeting of the next session of the present Congress, with the usual report thereon.

And substitute in lieu thereof:

The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means shall have the right to call together the committee and to file with the Clerk of the House any tariff bill which shall be ordered by the committee to publication, and the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, shall be filed together for publication not less than ten days after the filing sulpublication of the bill, unless an earlier date can be agreed upon. Either report may be filed after ten days if the other is not ready.

The original proposition contemplated no report whatever by the minority. Nothing in the rules of the House would authorize or permit any such thing, since that can be done only by leave of the House, and the House might not be in session.

I still entertain against this proposition very many of the objections which I presented this afternoon, but the original proposition, as I understand it from what was said by the chairman of the committee, is only a contingent one. Utterances on the part of various members of the Democratic party, and I think I may safely say also on the part of various members of the committee, would indicate perhaps an improbability of the matter being presented, and therefore, under the circumstances, I deem it my duty to present this suggestion of compromise, which I trust may be accepted.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, as I caught the proposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] I think there will be no difficulty in reaching an agreement upon it. I wish, however, to say that the original resolution did contemplate the filing of both committee and minority reports, and as written by myself and sent to the Clerk's desk, the language was "the usual reports," the word being in the plural.

Mr. REED. It is not that way in the copy which I saw.
Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The gentleman from Maine
[Mr. REED] will recollect that the discussion between himself and myself was somewhat upon the question of the minority report. I suggest to the gentleman that for the word "tariff" he substitute the word "revenue," so that there may be no narrow and technical interpretation of the resolution; and with that substitution, as I caught the suggestion of the gentleman, I think

Mr. REED. I will accept the amendment suggested, it being distinctly understood that that does not commit anybody to the doctrine of a tariff for revenue only [laughter], even when the proceeds are economically administered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, then, all further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with. The Chair supposes that is understood in the agreement. Without objection, all further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The last recorded vote shows only 159 gentlemen voting. If there be no objection, if gentlemen on that side will record their votes, the record would then show a quorum voting.

Mr. REED. The suggestion might be made that we are quite ready to have the Chair count us. [Laughter.]
Mr. PAYNE. If the Chair would rather count me in that way, I ask the privilege of recording my vote in favor of the

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recorded then.
Mr. PAYNE. Solely for the purpose of being counted.
The Clerk called the name of Mr. PAYNE, and he voted in the affirmative.

Other members were, at their own request, also recorded. On the roll call, as finally completed, there were-yeas 43, nays 153; not voting 157; as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum has now voted. The Chair will announce the vote. On this question the ayes are 43, and the noes are 153. The record now disclosing a quorum, without objection all further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with. The report of the Committee on Rules might be withdrawn, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. Reed] to the resolution offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Wilson] might be considered, without the report of the Committee on Rules. The Clerk will report the resolution introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Committee on Ways and Means are hereby granted leave to sit during the interval between the first and second sessions of the Fifty-third Congress, and may be convened by the call of the chairmasn. Said committee shall also be authorized to file with the Clerk of the House, during this interval, any bill it shall have prepared for the action of the House on the meeting of the next session of the present Congress, with the usual report thereon.

And the Clerk of the House is instructed forthwith to mail to each member of the House a copy of said bill and report, should the same be filed.

The SPEAKER. To this resolution the gentleman from Maine offers an amendment, which will now be read.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the copy which the Clerk has read has the word "report" I find, but the resolution which I sent to the Clerk's desk had the word "reports" in both places

The SPEAKER. That change will be made. To this relution the gentleman from Maine offers an amendment, which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the language, "and may be convened by the call of the chairman. Said committee shall also be authorized to file with the Clerk of the House during this interval any bill it shall have prepared for the action of the House on the meeting of the next seasion of the present Congress with the usual report thereon." and insert: "The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means shall have the right to call together the committee and to file with the Clerk of the House any revenue bill which shall be ordered by the committee for publication, and the report of the committee, together with the views of the minority, shall be filed together for publication not less than ten days after the filing and publication of the bill, unless an earlier date can be agreed upon. Either report may be filed after ten days if the other is not ready."

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Is there not some mistake about not less than ten days

Mr. REED. No: I stumbled over that for some time. it clear that it shall not be less than ten days after the filing and publication of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman wants ten days to elapse before the publication.

Mr. REED. I want ten days to elapse before the publication of the report. They are both to be published together, unless one should not file a report.

The SPEAKER. That seems to cover the point, that ten days must elapse. Without objection the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. WILSON of West Virginia, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution providing for final adjournment was passed. The motion was agreed to.

ERRONEOUS REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Committee on Claims will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1954) to repeal chapter 538 of volume 26 of United States Statutes at Large, and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Mc-KEIGHAN, for ten days, on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following personal request:

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McNagny. I ask leave to withdraw papers of Wm. Lyne, Lewis Deems, C. S. Bash, and Joseph Wolf.

The SPEAKER. Without objection this leave will be granted.
Mr. SPRINGER. A question of order. Is this leave to withdraw papers under the rule? I think the rule provides that copies of papers withdrawn should be left.
The SPEAKER. The Chair did not look. [After a pause.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not look. [After a pause.]
There is no provision in the request about leaving copies.
Mr. SPRINGER. What is the rule upon that subject? It ought to be subject to the rules.
Mr. HEARD. I will suggest that the request be amended so that it will be in accordance with the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois, that unless the House gives consent the papers can not be withdrawn without leaving copies. The House may give manimous consent to withdraw papers without leaving copies, but the rules require copies. but the rules require copies.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am informed that this is evidence for the Court of Claims and it is not necessary, as the rule provides copies shall be left.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the urgent deficiency bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deliciencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
L. F. LIVINGSTON,
J. G. CANNON,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. M. COCKRELL,
A. P. GORMAN,
S. M. CULLOM,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me its attention I will explain in a very few moments the matter of disagreement between the two Houses. The differences on five disagreement between the two Houses. The differences on five of the Senate amendments have been determined by the conferees, and their action has been approved by both Houses. The sixth Senate amendment is the only proposition that remains unsettled. That amendment appropriates the sum of $22,000 for the purpose of payment to certain clerks and employés in the Senate authorized by a resolution of the Senate which bears date, I believe, of September 30, 1890.

Mr. KILGORE. During the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. SAYERS. During the first session of the Fifty-first

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And offered by Senator Kenna

Mr. SAYERS. Now, during the second session of the Fifty-first Congress an amendment was placed upon the general defi-ciency bill by the Senate making an appropriation for the same purpose as in the amendment under consideration. That amendpurpose as in the amendment under consideration. That amendment came to the House and was rejected, and the Senate receded. At the first session of the Fifty-second Congress an amendment was again put by the Senate upon the general deficiency bill, of the same tenor as the present amendment. That amendment came to the House and was again rejected, and the Senate again receded. During the second session of the Fifty-second Congress the Senate for the third time placed a similar amendment upon the general deficiency bill. When the bill came back to the House the amendment was for the third time rejected by the House, and the Senate for the third time receded from the amendment.

ceded from the amendment.

The urgent deficiency bill, to which the pending amendment is attached, passed the House covering appropriations that were necessary to meet the current expenses of the Government. When the bill reached the Senate this amendment among others When the bill reached the senate this amendment among others was put upon it. In view of what has transpired between the two Houses, not only in the Fifty-first Congress but also in the Fifty-second, the conferees representing the House felt that they ought not to agree to this amendment, and they believed that it was their duty to submit the matter to the House so as to obtain the further judgment of the House upon the matter.

I do not believe that the House should agree to the amendment. In the first place the amendment, proposed is to a mendment.

ment. In the first place, the amendment proposed is to cover expenses incurred under a simple resolution of the Senate. In the second place the amendment is to cover an appropriation for an expenditure that occurred nearly three years ago, and which has been rejected by two Congresses. In the third place, the amendment is fastened upon an urgent deficiency bill, which is intended to meet current and pressing expenditures of the Government.

Now, it is due to the House that I should say this: That I have been told that the Senate will not recede.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. May I say a word to my friend?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It seems that Democratic Senators, when in a majority, are about as tenacious of their rights as Republican Senators were.

Mr. SAYERS. A Senator is a Senator. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This resolution, Mr. Speaker, was adopted, as the gentleman from Texas, chairman of the committee, has stated, in 1890, after a very lengthy session, when there were only about two months remaining between the close of that session and the beginning of the next regular session:

session and the beginning of the next regular session:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay the per diem clerks of committees of the Senate and clerks to Senators whom are authorized to be legally paid by the resolution of the Senate of September 30, 1890, a sum equalling two months' pay, the same to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be immediately available. The Senators, Mr. Speaker, involved in this matter are nearly all Democrats; the clerks are nearly all Democratic clerks. In many instances the Senators, out of their own pockets, have paid to their clerks the amount that they were entitled to under this resolution; in other instances the clerks have paid their own expenses, their railroad expenses and their hotel bills; and it is due to the Senators, who can not be represented on this floor, to say to the Senators, who can not be represented on this floor, to say that they feel in honor-bound for this money; and they insist upon it, and will continue to insist upon it. I may just as well say, Mr. Speaker, that this agreement was had by the committee in conference, and I hope this House will indorse it, that for the present the bill may remain in conference for a future un-derstanding in the December session.

derstanding in the December session.

Now, that was an agreement by the entire committee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Who speaks for the committee?

Mr. DINGLEY. Did I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to say that he was in favor of the House receding?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir. I desired to state—and I think it just to Senators who are represented on one side of this question.

Mr. DINGLEY. The statement the gentleman made seemed to look in the direction of receding.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am only stating the facts; and I want to say that I am decidedly in favor of this House simply recognizing this matter as it is left in the hands of the conferees; and some day or another, if we can agree upon it, we will so report.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In that connection allow me to say that the statement of the gentleman from Georgia is perhaps a little too broad. Having signed the conference report as a minority conferee, I can not agree with the gentleman from Georgia that it is politic or proper to let this bill fail, because there are items of appropriation on the bill which I think ought to be cared for. One is for custodians and janitors of public buildings cared for. One is for custodians and janitors of public buildings throughout the country; perhaps that is the most important item on the bill, and I have no doubt that money ought to be appropriated

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to the gentleman-Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Money for this purpose was appropriated at the last session of Congress; and if this special session had not been called the Secretary of the Treasury would have been obliged to go right along and provide for those matters without this fund, and in my humble opinion this matter ought not to have been brought before the House at this extra session. Mr. CANNON of Illinois. In reply to the gentleman from Georgia, I desire to say that while the regular annual appropriation was made for this purpose, it was very greatly below the estimates and very considerably below the necessities of the service. And I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that under our statutes no deficiency can be made without a violation of law. It is the duty of an executive officer not to spend more than a proportionate part of the appropriation within spend more than a proportionate part of the appropriation within any given portion of the year.

I think it proper that this statement should be made. Of course, what the House may do is another question. One course of action would be to sustain the conference committee, because I am quite sure, from what I know of the temper of the House conferees, that without the instructions of the House they would not feel warranted in receding upon this point. So that either the House ought now to adopt this conference report, which possibly, and I think probably, means a failure of the entire bill, or the House ought to instruct its conferees (if such is its temper) to recede; or the House might take the matter into its own hands and adopt a motion to recede from the disagreement with the Senate on this one amendment (the only thing now in controversy), whereby this bill, on receiving the approval of the President, would be enacted into law. I beg pardon of the gentleman in charge of the bill for making the statement, but I thought it proper to make it now in reply to the gentleman from Georgia, that the House might fully understand the situation as I understand it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from Tennessee desires time

I will yield to him.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask a question of my colleague on the committee, but the chairman has yielded to me a moment.

I do not wish to detain the House, but I think it proper to impress this point in regard to the pending appropriation bill, and we should have due regard to this fact in our action with reference to the conference report. That is, that the bill ought not to fail entirely, for the reason, as I am informed at the Treasury Department, that the funds for paying the firemen, engineers, and others whose services are absolutely necessary to keep the public buildings in a habitable condition during the winter weather, have been dispensed with in many of the public buildings in the condition of the condition ings throughout the country because of the lack of funds. I know that is the case at Nashville, and also with a number of public buildings elsewhere throughout the country, and unless the urgency bill becomes a law there will be suffering in the public buildings amongst the clerks and officials generally by reason of Mr. BRETZ. Is not the Senate as much interested in the passage of the bill as we are?

Mr. ALLEN. Maybe some of them will resign.

Mr. WASHINGTON. And when it is stated that this bill should fail rather than that an agreement should be reached on the pending question, I want that borne in mind. I am inclined for one to oppose to the bitter end the yielding to the Senate's demand the St. 1000 in this case which is to seem liabilities in demand for $21,000 in this case, which is to cover liabilities in-curred during the sessions of the Fifty-first Congress for clerical hire in that body, and I think if the House insists on its position that our conferees will be able to agree with the Senate and save the bill

Mr. CAMPBELL. That money ought to be paid.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from Tennessee is through, I desire to move that the House further insist on its disagreement, and ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question? I would like to know if he considers that this ought not to be paid under any circumstances?

Mr. SAYERS. That is my opinion.

Mr. KILGORE. And what is the opinion of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is also my opinion.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I understood some gentleman to say, a member of the conference committee, that the Senators had informed them in conference that they regarded this as a personal responsibility; that is, this expenditure in behalf of the clerks. I would like to know if I was correct in that understanding:

Mr. SAYERS. Why, Mr. Speaker, the expenditure would have been paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; but that fund was exhausted, hence the effort on the part of the Senate to place this amendment on the urgent deficiency bill.

Now, it occurs to me that if the House should recede from its position, it will in doing so indorse the action of the Senate in providing for the payment of these session clerks and clerks to Senators during the vacation between the first and the second-sessions of the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Did I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] to say that the Senators had become pergia [Mr. Livingston] to say that the Senators had become personally liable for this payment?

Mr. Livingston. No: I only said that some Senators had stated they had paid some of this money out of their own pockets, and in other instances the clerks had borne their own expenses, that Senators considered themselves in honor bound to secure this money for these clerks. But the chairman of our committee has stated a fact which I do not want the House to overlook, that this money was to be paid originally out of the Senate contingent fund, and now it is proposed to take it out of a very different fund.

Mr. ALLEN. This money was paid out in expenses for what?
Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, the gentleman who was Senator
Kenna's clerk states to me in a private letter that he was sent twice to West Virginia on Mr. Kenna's business as a Senate clerk, and paid his railroad expenses. So Mr. Jones, who was clerk to Senator Brown, then a Senator from my State, says that he was sent to Atlanta twice and paid his railroad fare, and Senators themselves have made similar statements.

Mr. ALLEN. Is that a part of legitimate Government expenses:

Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I resolution of the Senate. It is not; but it is provided for in this

Mr. SPRINGER. As I understand, the first session of the Fifty-first Congress adjourned on the 2d day of October and the second session began on the first Monday of December following, so that there was a period of two months between the long and the short session.

Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. SAYERS. 188. Mr. SPRINGER. And the Senators desire pay for their session clerks and clerks to Senators to cover that period?

Mr. SAYERS. They do.
Mr. LIVINGSTON. To cover those two months.
Mr. ENLOE. I would like to inquire whether the Senate could not secure the payment of this money by increasing its contingent fund and then paying this money out of that fund?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] might well state, I think, that the Senate is per-feetly willing to do that.

Mr. SAYERS. The Senate is perfectly willing.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Provided we appropriate the money. Mr. SAYERS. The conferees of the Senate are perfectly willing to have the matter arranged in that way, provided we recognize the right of the Senate to make this indebtedness.

Mr. Speaker. I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement and ask for a further conference with the Senate. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. C ANNON of Illinois. I will suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Sayers] that in order to place the matter be-fore the House in the most favorable light, it seems to me it would be well that a motion be made that the House recede from its disagreement.

Mr. SAYERS. I am willing. The gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. CANNON] can make the motion.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Very well; for the purpose of testing the sense of the House I will make the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moves that the House recede from its disagreement to the Sen ate amendment, and agree to the same.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr.

SAYERS) there were -ayes 4, noes 120.

So the motion to concur in the Senate amendment was disagreed to.

agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection an order will be made that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment, and ask for a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

There was no objection; and the Speaker appointed as conferces on the part of the House Mr. SAYERS, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois.
Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, if there be no further business

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 83) donating an abandoned cannon to the committee in charge of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1894; when the Speaker signed the same.

DETAIL OF OFFICERS TO COLLEGES.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, before the House adjourns I desire to ask unanimous consent that the House concur in the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 3571). It will only take a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Wheeler] has a bill to which there is a Senate amendment. The gentleman thinks it can be disposed of in a moment, and the Chair will submit it to the House.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I send to the Clerk's desk the bill (H. R. 3571) to increase the number of officers of the Army to be detailed to colleges, together with the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amend-

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as lollows:
In line 7, after the words "United States," insert "and no officer shall be thus detailed who has not had five years' service in the Army, and no detail to such duty shall extend for more than four years; and officers on the retired list of the Army may, upon their own application, be detailed to such duty, and when so detailed shall receive the full pay of their rank."

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. OUTHWAITE], who is absent tonight, requested me to ask the House to concur in the Senate amendment, and pursuant to that request I make that motion, that the House concur. The bill passed the House some weeks since. It authorized an increase in the number of officers detailed for such duty to 110. The Senate amendment does not affect the number of officers to be detailed.

The motion was agreed to.
On motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

And then, on motion of Mr. SAYERS (at 8 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, November 3, 1893, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, November 3, 1893.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D.D. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings; when, on motion of Mr. COCKRELL, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The VICE-PRESIDENT announced his signature to the enrolled bill (H. R. 2821) for the relief of W. W. Rollins, late collector fifth district North Carolina, for value of stamps destroyed by fire at Winston, N. C., on November 13, 1892, which had previously received the signature of the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T.O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House still further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6 to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes; asked a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. SAYERS, Mr. LIVINGSTON, and Mr. CANNON of Illinois managers at the further conference on the part of the

ENROLLED HILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 83) donating an abandoned cannon to the committee in charge of the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, at Pittsburg, Pa., in 1894; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. COCKRELL. I report back favorably from the Committee on Appropriations the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives providing for the final adjournment of the present session of Congress, and I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives. That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 3d day of November, present, at 3 o'clock p. m.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, since it appears that a yea-andnay vote is not to be taken on the resolution to adjourn, I rise to place on record my opposition to it.

place on record my opposition to it.

The Congress should not adjourn, but should continue in session and proceed in the transaction of public business, of which there is a large amount demanding attention. This is shown by the Calendar lying on the desk of every senator. Much of it is of great importance. The Federal elections bill is before the Senate, having passed the House. The bankruptcy bill is being debated in the House, and will be in this body in a very few days, if it is to come at all. Quite a number of bills passed by the House are in the Senate awaiting action. Some of those it is important should be passed at once. Many more would be poured portant should be passed at one. Many more would be poured into the Senate, were it understood that both Houses would proceed in the dispatch of business inste d of adjourning. reduction has been promised the country by the Democratic party, and if this promise is not to be broken (as another of equal importance has already been), it is time the decks were being cleared ready for the contest to be made over it.

It was understood by the country earlier in the year that an extra session of Congress would be called in October to take up and act on this subject; yet we find Congress, already in session, proposing to adjourn without preparing the way for a tariff bill when one may be ready, by transacting public business which must be done in this or the regular session. An adjournment now means a session running through the hot months of next summer, and possibly into the late fall, when elections are to occur, leaving the people no time for a proper understanding of the new tariff law we hope to see enacted.

It is my conviction that the Democratic party has everything to lose and nothing to gain by adjourning now, and that the Republican party has everything to gain and nothing to lose by it. The plea that we will have no quorum here is not a legitimate one. We have no right to act on the assumption that Senators will violate their obligation to be here and discharge their public duties. Let it be known that Congress refuses to adjourn and a quorum will be here and remain. The public opinion of the country will compel a quorum to be here. Mr. President, the poorest way that I can think of to serve the country and the Democratic party is for this Congress to ad journ, leave the public business, and go home. Holding this opinion, I here record my protest against the resolution of adjournment.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I did not intend to take the time of the Senate to express my views upon the propriety of an adjournment at this time, and should have said nothing had not the Senator from Texas addressed the Senate upon the subject.

I should probably disagree with him about the importance of early action upon some of the measures on the Calendar, but I entirely agree with him that it would be b tter for Congress to remain in session during the present month of November and to transact the business which will come before it than to extend the next session into the heated term. I do not believe that any Senator living in the Northern States can with impunity remain in Washington during two successive summers. Cert inly I know that I have jeopardized my health by attending in the Senate as much as I have done at the present session. I think it would have been far better if Congress had remained in session it would have been far better if Congress had remained in session during the present month and been able to adjourn by the 1st of July next year, in order that we might enjoy a vacation during the heated period of summer. I hope that even if we do adjourn now an effort at least will be made to get rid of the business of Congress, pass the appropriation bills, and get away from here by the 1st of July next year.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that for the reasons so well expressed by the Senator from Texas. I have been from the beginning and am still opposed to adjourning at this time. I think we ought to stay here and dispatch the public business as rapidly as possible and redeem our pledges to the lic business as rapidly as possible and redeem our pledges to the

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I heartly concur in what my distinguished colleagues here have said, but they are aware as well as I am that it is not worth while for us to talk when we actually know that querums can not be kept in the Senate and the other House for the transaction of business during the re-mainder of the present month; that no tariff bill will be ready to be reported to the other House until the first Monday in December: that no appropriation bills can be prepared before that time, and that an a tempt to remain in session and transact business without any ability to do it would not accomplish anything

For that reason, against my own judgment and as a matter of public necessity, I favor the passage of the resolution.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to place upon record my concurrence with the disapproval of the resolution of adjournment as stated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE]. I believe that the condition of the country requires the presence of Congress here. I think there will be far greater distress throughout the country than exists at this time. I believe there will be many thousands of people out of employment, perhaps hundreds of thousands, and that the general financial condition of the country and its industrial condition forebode a degree of distress during the coming winter that will require consideration on the part of Con-

For one, I wish to place upon record my belief that it is the duty of Congress to remain here and relieve the condition of the

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, if a yea-and-nay vote were to be taken upon this proposition I would not have made any statement whatever; but I agree with the Senator from Texas that it is the duty of Congress to go on and do the business of the people of the country as they expected us to do it. I had hoped that the tariff bill would be reported to the other House before this time, and although it has not been done, as the Senator from Texas so well said there are a great many other measures, and one that I regard of vital importance, which have already pas the House of Representatives and are now pending in the Senate. That measure of vital importance is the bill for the repeal of the present election laws. It seems to me that it would have been better on all sides if we had remained here and disposed of the business before us, so that we could have been prepared to go on with the tariff bill when it came from the House of Representatives

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that it would be an idle parade of zeal to attempt to continue the present session until December. The business that we were brought here in extra session to consider and transact is behind us. The strain of the dog days was upon us when we came here, and continued for two months thereafter; and the excitement of the session, the calling away of Senators from their homes and business during the long vacation upon which most of us count for opportunity to attend to private business, have put all or almost all of us to great inconvenience, and the barely four weeks that we shall have between now and the regular session are essential not only for the private convenience of Senators who have been under this great strain, but they are of Senators who have been under this great strain, but they are essential for the country, in my opinion.

If we had transacted the business for which we were called within a few weeks after convening here, I for one would have been in favor of staying and attempting to transact during the autumn some of the important business that claims the attention of Congress and has claimed the attention of the country. But as that is not the case, and as we are all endeavoring to do our duty in our own way and according to our own light, patriotically on all sides, as I believe, and have arrived at this late date in the autumn with only four weeks between us and the regular session, I think no public service will be performed by our remaining longer in session. I hope very much that the resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, it is my misfortune to disagree with nearly everyone who has spoken. I think that we would expedite business in the next session by adjourning. My experience in Congress in over twenty years teaches me that the sessions are prolonged mostly on account of the appropriation bills. I hazard nothing when I say that an inspection of our statutes during that time will show that our appropriation bills have been passed and signed in the last hours of a session. So it has been with the great question we have here now, the tariff, whenever we have attempted to deal with it. I have had something to do with preparing tariff bills, as some other gentlemen here have had, and I know that those who are charged with the preparation of a tariff bill at this time in the other House will make haste by Congress being away. So it will be with the Appropriations Committee. Both the Committee on Ways and Means and the Appropriations Committee of the other the Appropriations Committee. Both the Committee on Ways and Means and the Appropriations Committee of the other House will remain here and prepare these bills, the consideration of which will prolong the session, and, as they will be ready to report them in December, the bills will be passed earlier than such measures have been passed hitherto. If in the meantime this body will amend its rules so that after a measure shall have this body will amend its rules so that after a measure shall have received ample consideration a majority may pass on it, we shall get away from here before the beginning of the summer.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I am here for the purpose of transacting business, and I very much prefer transacting it at this time of the year to waiting until the summer months of next year.

The Senator term Polyavara [Mr. Chay] gave that the work

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] says that the work which we were called here to perform lies behind us; but the Senator from Delaware seems to forget that the consequences of that work are rapidly confronting us, and that some measures must be taken for the relief of the country.

I think I can safely speak for my Populist colleagues when I say that we are here ready to continue work. We are here for the purpose of helping to pass a proper tariff bill and to assist in all legislation designed for the benefit of the people of the While we have no desire to offer any captious obstruction to what is to take place here, I hope that the Senator in charge of the pending resolution will withhold it at least a sufficient length of time to allow me to introduce a resolution which I releagues. It can be passed here to-day, and passed in the other House to-day or to-morrow morning. I hope that will be done, so that we shall not be compelled to resort to the extreme measure of calling for a quorum, as we would be compelled to do. Mr. HIGGINS. We can not hear the Senator from Nebraska on this side.

on this side,

Mr. ALLEN. I say I hope that this may be done, so that we may not be compelled to resort to the extreme measure of calling for a quorum, as we would be compelled to on the resolution, and by that means disclose the lack of a quorum.

Mr. MANDERSON. We were unable to hear the Senator's statement. Will he please repeat it? To what bill does he re-

Mr. ALLEN. I say I have a measure, a concurrent resolution, that I desire to introduce this morning and get the action of the Senate upon, and I desire a sufficient length of time to have the resolution go to the other House and be acted upon there before final adjournment takes place. I hope the Senator having in charge the resolution which is now before the Senate will let that matter be passed over until this resolution can be acted

Mr. DOLPH. Will not the Senator read his resolution as a part of his remarks in order that we may be informed as to what the measure is?

Mr. ALLEN. I will do so.
Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President—
Mr. COCKRELL. Let the resolution the Senator from Nebraska proposes to offer be read.
Mr. DOLPH. Let it be read as part of his remarks.
Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to address a circular letter to the several consuls and consular agents of the United States, advising them of the depressed condition of our labor market, and asking them to discourage immigration to this country until such time as they are advised of a changed condition in such labor market.

Mr. CULLOM. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I consented to the report of the resolution for final adjournment. I supposed it was a foregone conclusion that the majority of the Senate desired to adjourn until the regular session in December.

While I shall vote for the resolution, I wish to say that there seem to be in the minds of the majority two great measures, as they are called, one the passage of the bill repealing the election laws and the other the passage of the tariff-reform bill.

I wish to add that if Congress should now announce to the country that it did not intend either to repeal the election laws or to pass a tariff bill and should then adjourn, it would be doing or to pass a tariff bill and should then adjourn, it would be doing a very good piece of work for the country.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust the resolution reported by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, may be adopted.

It is plain to usall, sir, that if we undertake to go on in continuous session during the month of November we shall have difficulty in maintaining a quorum here, and, in my judgment, we shall find it impossible to do it. The House of Representatives has very clearly demonstrated its purpose by the passage of the resolution which is now before the Senate.

resolution which is now before the Senate.

The object of the resolution is not to stop the progress that this Congress is making with the bills which, of necessity, must demand its attention; but I believe we shall make haste by adopting the resolution and leaving the important committees of Ways and Means and Appropriations of the other House to go along through the vacation, during the month of November, with the perfection of the tariff bill and the general appropriation bills. Surely no good, in my judgment, will come from a prolongation of this session.

As to the concurrent resolution indicated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], however important it may be, it is hardly to be expected that the Senate and House of Representatives, if a majority should be in favor of adjourning now, will both agree to continue this session in order to give consideration to that resolution. For one, I do not see its prime importance. I believe a majority of the Senate wants to concur in the resolution sent from the other House.

As to the trouble the Senator from Nebraska indicates when he speaks of being forced to call for a quorum to pass upon the resolution, I apprehend there is no foundation for that. We have a quorum here now, in my judgment, and, if it be insisted upon, I am sure that a call of the roll will develop that a quorum is present.

believe the best interests of the country are to be consulted by concurring in the House resolution providing for an adjournment at 3 o'clock to-day, and I hope the Senate will concur in it.

Mr. PEFFER. I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I insist that if we are all opposed to adjourning, or at least if there is any considerable number opposed to adjourning, we ought to say so in some such form as that the country will understand it. For that reason, I ask that the vote on concurring in the resolution may be taken by yeas and nays.

The resolution was concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide

A bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an acceptance of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892;
A bill (H. R. 2799) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of South Dakota;

A bill (H. R. 3571) to increase the number of officers of the Army to be detailed to colleges; and A bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States,"

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PALMER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1152) to develop and facilitate the interstate commerce of the whole country, and more especially that of the twenty-two States and two Territories which are in whole or in part drained by the Mis-sissippi River and its tributaries, that has an area of 1,575,092 square miles and a present population of 35,946,901 and a total taxable property value of $11,874,442,264, when the total population of all the balance of the States and Territories is but 26,407,966 and their total taxable property valuation is $11,353,-199,387; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION AND NATIONAL MUSEUM REPORTS.

Mr. MORRILL submitted the following concurrent resolution, which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That there be printed of the reports of the Smithsonian Institution and the National Museum for the year ending June 30, 1893, in two octavo volumes, 10,000 extra copies; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 5,000 copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution, and 2,000 copies for the use of the National Museum.

Mr. MORRILL. This resolution has been delayed by accident. It simply covers the usual number of volumes to be printed, and is in the usual form. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so referred.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House bill 4177

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, still further insisting on its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and ask-regreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and asking for a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

Mr. HIGGINS. What is the motion?

Mr. COCKRELL. The motion is to agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the amendment of the Senate as to which they have been always as the senate as to which they have been always as the senate as to which they have been always as the senate as to which they have been always as the senate as Senate, as to which there has been a disagreement between the two Houses in regard to the payment of its clerks. The House refused to agree to it and we have insisted upon it and intend to insist upon it until it is agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The que The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. Cock-RELL, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CULLOM were appointed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 1916) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Little River, in the State of Arkan-

A bill (H. R. 1918) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Calcasieu and Sabine rivers. in the States of Louisiana and Texas.

NECHES AND SABINE RIVER BRIDGES.

The bill (H. R. 3689) authorizing the Gulf, Beaumont and Kansas City Railway Company to bridge to Neches and Sabina rivers, in the States of Texas and Louisiana, was read twice by its title.

Mr. COKE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill from the House, the title of which has just been read, be considered immediately

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. PLATT. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas whether there is an immediate necessity for the passage of this bill? It is rather an unusual proceeding to pass in this way a bill coming from the other House.

Mr. COKE. The necessity for the passage of the bill consists

Mr. COKE. The necessity for the passage of the bill consists in the fact that the companies are standing on the banks of the river, ready to cross with their bridges, and can not do it until authorized by this bill.

Mr. PLATT. Is the bill in the usual form for allowing the bridging of rivers?

Mr. COKE. I think so. It has not been before the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, but it has passed the other House; it has been before the Chief of Engineers, and it comes to us now when we have only two or three hours of time left.

Mr. DOLPH. Is there a Senate bill on the subject?

Mr. COKE. I think not. This is a House bill.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask if this bill has been passed upon by the appropriate committee of the Senate?

Mr. COKE. It has not. It has just come from the other House. I ask that the bill may be taken up and put on its passage now because there is immediate necessity for it.

Mr. HIGGINS. Is it a bill permitting bridges to be built?
Mr. COKE. The bill I desire passed is for bridging the Neches and Sabine rivers, in the States of Texas and Louisiana.
Mr. PLATT. Let the bill be read at length.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.
Mr. BUTLER. Before the bill is read I give notice that, after the conclusion of its consideration, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. As there is some confusion in relation to the bill, I think the Senator from Texas had better let it go over.

Mr. COKE. I should like to have it considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair asked whether there was objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PLATT. I object, certainly, until it has been read for information. I do not believe in having any bill passed without information. I do not believe in naving any one pair it having been read.

Mr. COKE. I ask that it be read.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to appeal to the Senator from Texas to allow me to make a statement for a few moments about a matter, and then he may consent or object to my request, as he chooses.

Mr. COKE. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. A bill came from the other House yesterday giving to the World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition similar privileges in respect to the importation of articles for exhibition which were given to the Columbian Exposition. The Sention which were given to the Columbian Exposition. tion which were given to the Columbian Exposition. The Senator from New York [Mr. Hill] called my attention to it last ator from New York [Mr. Hill] called my attention to it last evening, and expressed great anxiety for its immediate passage for the reason that the exposition begins on the 24th day of this month and ends on the 15th day of January next.

There is no quorum of the Finance Committee present, but I have consulted the chairman of the committee [Mr. VOORHEES], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPherson], and all agree there is no objection to the passage of the bill; inview of which fact I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for its present consideration. It is a very brief bill and will take very little time.

I have had the bill examined by a former clerk of the Committee on Finance, and am informed that it grants no privilege mittee on Finance, and am informed that it grants no privilege which has not been granted to the Exposition at Chicago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. PLATT. I withhold my consent until I have heard the bill read. I ask that it be read for information.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the bill be read, if the Senator from Texas

[Mr. Coke] consents.

Mr. Coke. I ask that it be read.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say publicly what I said just now privately to the Senator from Texas.

It is a very bad practice, indeed, to pass bills of this important in the said just now privately to the senator from Texas. tance without their reference to a committee, and almost all the b d legislation which gets into our statute books is enacted on the last day of a session.

I think the Sen tor from Texas, before he asks the Senate to pass the bill referred to by him, should have some one, at least, of the experienced members of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Cullom], or the Senator from Oregon [Mr. Dolph], or some other member of that committee, to examine the bill carefully, so as to be able to say that he has examined it, and that it is in the usual form. That will not take ten minutes. I think if the Senator from Texas will withdraw request until that is done, nobody will then object to the bill. I should be perfectly willing to take the Senator's own inspection of the bill; but, being interested in the State for which the legislation is proposed, he would, of course, prefer to have some other Senator make the exam nation.

Mr. COKE. I am willing to adopt the Senator's suggestion.
Mr. CULLOM. I think the bill under consideration is a different bill entirely from that to which the Senator from Massachusetts refers.

Mr. HOAR. I know.
Mr. COKE. I am entirely willing that the Senators of the Committee on Conmerce may examine the bill, and I shall endeavor to have it taken up subsequently.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WORLD'S FAIR PRIZE WINNERS' EXPOSITION.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood that the Senate had given consent for the consideration of a bill, for which I had asked consideration, in reference to the New York Exposition, and five members of the Finance Committee, the only members of the committee here, have agreed to report the bill favorably. Of course that does not amount to a quorum of the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DOLPH. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly, let the bill be read for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina withdraw his motion for that purpose?

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw it for the time being.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 4015) in aid of the World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition, to be held at New York City. The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. Towles, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved April 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BYNUM, Mr. McMillin, and Mr. Payne managers at the conference on the part of the House.

SESSION EMPLOYES AT MALTBY BUILDING.

Mr. WHITE of Louisiana, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. GORMAN, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he hereby is, authorized to continue the present session employes at the Maithy building authorized under resolution of July 26, 1892, during the coming recess of Congress.

Mr. WHITE of Lousiana, from the Committee to Audit and Mr. WHITE of Lousiana, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. VOORHEES, reported adversely thereon, and it was postponed indefinitely, as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ an additional messenger, at an annual salary of $1,440, to be paid from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise provided.

THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

Mr. HOAR, Mr. President, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due and hereby tendered to the Ion. Isham G. Harris for the ability, dignity, courtesy, and impartially with which he has discharged the duties of the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.
Mr. HARRIS was called to the chair by the Vice-President, and said: Senators, I am profoundly grateful for the honor you have done me by the passage of the resolution just presented by the Senator from Massachusetts.

THANKS TO THE VICE-PRESIDENT.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate are due and are hereby tendered to the Hon. ADLAI E. STEVENSON, Vice-President of the United States, for the ability, dignity, courtesy, and impartiality with which he has presided over their deliberations during the present session of Congress.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

REPORT OF THE LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to yield to me for a moment that I may submit a report from the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir, for the time being. the motion immediately after the matter he brings up is disposed of.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr MILLS, October 30, 1893, reported it without amendment; and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1892 be printed, and that 500 extra copies, with covers, be printed for distribution by the Librarian.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the present consideration of the esolution. The printing will cost only $10.

Mr. BUTLER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President— Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw the motion that the Senator from North Carolina may present a resolution.

Mr. RANSOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved. That a committee of two members of the Senate be appointed to join a similar committee on the part of the House of Representatives to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are ready to adjourn, and respectfully inquire if he has any further communication to make to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. How shall the committee on the part of the Senate be appointed?

Mr. RANSOM, and others. By the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair appoints the Sena-tor from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

R. 198) to grant to the Birmingham, Sheffield and Tennessee River Railway Company the right of way over the public lands. I see that it is attributed to Mr. HALL of Missouri. I desire that the correction be made, and that Minnesota be substituted for Missouri.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made. The Journal was then approved.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of the findings of the court in the cases of the following-named persons against the United States: J. O. Buford, S. W. George, James Bridgman, deceased; A. Morrison, deceased; which were referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

VIEWS OF MINORITY.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, with reference to the bill for the admission of Utah, I want to say further that any member of the committee shall have the right to file a minority report. The SPEAKER. Without objection, any member of the Committee on Territories will have the right to file the views of the minority on the bill indicated.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the

A bill (H. R. 2002) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide the times and places for holding terms of United States courts in the States of Idaho and Wyoming," approved July 5, 1892:

A bill (H. R. 2799) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of South Dakota;

A bill (H. R. 3571) to increase the number of officers of the Army to be detailed to colleges; and

A bill (H. R. 3687) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States," approved May 5, 1892.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives to furnish each Representative and Delegate additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was asked.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 460) granting to the State of California 5 per cent of the net proceeds of the cash sales of public lands in said State, in which the concurrence of the House was asked.

REMISSION OF DUTIES ON GOODS EXHIBITED AT WORLD'S FAIR.

The Speaker laid before the House the following House resolution, with a Senate amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved April 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to non-concur in the Senate amendment and agree to a conference. The SPEAKER. The Senate amendment will be reported.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendment will be reported. The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "permit" down to and including the word "Provided," as follows: "the sale and delivery, subject to the approval of the director-general, during the exhibition of goods, wares, and merchandise heretofore imported, and now in the Exposition buildings, subject to such additional regulations for the security of the revenue and the collection of the duties thereon as the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion prescribe.

"SEC. 2. That the entire stock of each exhibitor, consisting of goods, wares, and merchandise, imported by him and now in said buildings or that may hereafter be exhibited in the buildings of the California Midwinter International Exposition as per act approved September 1, 1893, is hereby declared liable for the payment of duties accruing on any portion thereof, case of removal of such portion from said buildings without the payment of the lawful duties thereon.

"Sec. 3. That the penalties prescribed by, and the provisions contained in, section 3082 of the Revised Statutes shall be deemed and held to apply in case of any goods, wares, or merchandise now in said building, or that may hereafter be exhibited in the buildings of the California Midwinter International Exposition as per act approved September 1, 1893, sold, delivered, or removal exhibition as per act approved September 1, 1893, sold, delivered, or removal exhibition as per act approved September 1, 1893, sold, delivered, or removal shall be deemed and held to have been so imported with the knowledge of the parties respectively concerned in such sale, delivery, or removal: Provided, That in the assessment of duties upon goods, wares, and merchandise, imported and now on exhibition at the World's Columbian Exposition, as authorized by the act approved April 25, 1890, entitled 'An act to provide for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by hold

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is there any other amendment. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to nonconcur in the Senate amendment and agree to a conference.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Is there no other amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. May not the Senate amendment be reported

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that portion of the bill stricken out. The amendment was again read.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would be glad to ask the gentle man from Indiana if it is the intention, and does the gentleman believe, that this committee can make a report during this ses-

Mr. BYNUM. I can not say, Mr. Speaker, as to that. I presume that if there can be any agreement at all, it will be made in time for the House to act upon it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If I understand the scope of the amendment of the Senate, it is to strike out substantially the provisions in the House bill that rebate of one-half of the duties upon foreign goods that were upon exhibition at Chicago, and ermits the remission of the duty on goods that may be donated to the new museum now being founded at Chicago or that may be purchased for the museum to be donated. Am I correct?

Mr. BYNUM. That is the effect of the amendment, as I understand it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I must say that I am in harmony with the amendment, and it is very important, if any action is to be had at all, as the goods are being moved, that it should be had at once. Would the gentleman be willing to concur in the Senate amendment?

Mr. BYNUM. I am not. Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Indiana had better let us dispose of it.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senate be nonconcurred in and the House agree to a con-

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to concur in the Senate amendment.
Mr. BYNUM. That is not in order. This bill would have to be considered in Committee of the Whole if it is not to be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill has been considered in Committee

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole. Nothing has been added by the Senate. They simply strike out a portion of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been considered in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment of the Senate merely strikes out a part of the bill. The amondment is not such an one as must be considered in Committee of the Whole, because it has already been considered in committee.

Mr. BYNUM. The amendment itself requires consideration in Committee of the Whole as well as the original bill. The SPEAKER. The bill itself has been considered in Com-The amendment itself requires consideration mittee of the Whole and in the House, and the amendment of the Senate is to strike out a part of the bill. The Senate adds no new matter; and the Chair will call the attention of the gentleman to the rule.

The Clerk will report the rule. The Clerk read as follows:

House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in Committee of the Whole, may be at once disposed of as the House may

The SPEAKER. This bill has already been considered in Committee of the Whole once, and it seems to the Chair that it would be in order for the House to dispose of it either by con-curring or nonconcurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I understand that if a House proposition requiring consideration in Committee of the Whole is amended in the Senate, when it comes back to the House it is not excluded from the provision of Rule XX, which requires that it shall go to the Committee of the Whole if, originating in the House, it would have been considered in committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there are numerous de-The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there are numerous decisions covering this question. An amendment of the Senate providing for a new and distinct subject of taxation, or for an appropriation not included in the original bill, must receive consideration in Committee of the Whole; but there is nothing of that nature in this amendment. This bill has once been considered in Committee of the Whole, and the amendment is simply a recognition to the court part of it. The Chair therefore a proposition to strike out part of it. The Chair, therefore, thinks that the bill having been once considered in Committee of the Whole and the amendment of the Senate being of the nature stated, the rules do not require that it should be considered again in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BYNUM. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House

nonconcur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] moves that the House concur in the Senate amendments. that motion be voted down, it will be equivalent to a vote of nonconcurrence.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard a moment upon that motion. As I understand, the House passed a bill providing for a rebate of half the duty on such imported articles in the Exposition as should be sold, and, in the course of the consideration of the bill, amended it so as to allow a full rebate of duty on such articles as should be donated to or purchased by the Columbian Museum. I understand that the Senate has struck out all of the bill except the provision relating to the Columbian Museum, and has done it with entire unanimity. Now, it seems to me that if there is to be any legislation at all on this subject at this session, we must concur at once in the Senate amend-ment. Otherwise, if this matter is to be delayed and to go to a committee of conference on the disputed point on which Senate seems to be substantially unanimous, there will probably be no legislation at all on the subject at this session.

I hope, therefore, that the House will concur with the Senate amendment admitting free of duty such articles as may be purchased by or donated to the Columbian Museum, and striking out all the rest of the bill.

Mr. BYNUM. The original bill as reported simply provided for a reduction of duty on the foreign exhibits therein referred to. There was an amendment added in the House releasing entirely from payment of duty all of those exhibits that might be donated to or purchased by the Columbian Museum.

As the bill passed the Senate the concession made to the foreign exhibitors was struck out and that portion of the bill alone left standing which provided that exhibits donated to the Columbian Museum, or purchased by that institution, should be re-leased from payment of all duty. I think it is but just and fair to the committee reporting the bill, after the expression of the will of the House on the subject, to nonconcur in the Senate amendment and appoint a committee of conference, and let us see if we can not get some more liberal terms for the foreign exhibitors. So far as the provision in reference to the Columbian Museum is concerned, I am in favor of it, and if no better terms can be obtained for the foreign exhibitors I suppose the House will approve the bill as passed by the Senate, but I am in hopes that we can come to an agreement by which we can show som: courtesy to the foreign exhibitors, and for that reason I move to nonconcur and agree to a conference

Mr. DINGLEY. Does not the gentleman think that any such effort as that, at this late hour of the session, will inevitably result in the loss of the bill?

Mr. BYNUM. I do not see why it should. Mr. DINGLEY. If this Congress is going to adjourn at 3 o'clock this afternoon-

Mr. BYNUM. I do not think this Congress is going to adjourn at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, I am only speaking in view of the action that has been taken in that direction. Furthermore, it seems to me, in view of the general situation, that we ought to content ourselves with admitting free of duty the articles donated to or purchased by the Columbian Museum, and not under the target of the tors and takes to the desired the target of target of the target of the target of t take to go further and make a rebate of duty upon articles that may be sold by foreign exhibitors.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that the House agree to the Senate amendment.

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were-ayes 36, noes 78.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is nonconcurred in. Without objection, the House will agree to the request of the Senate for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and the Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. BYNUM; the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE.

W. H. WARD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 45) for the relief of W. H. Ward; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Patents.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH INDIAN AND OKLAHOMA TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1021) to grant the right of way to the Kansas, Oklahoma, Central and Southwestern Railway Company through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes

Mr. HUDSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this bill make an original grant? Mr. HUDSON. No, sir; it does not grant anything; it simply allows a right of way.

Mr. HOLMAN. But this is an original measure—not an extension of time as to a right previously granted?

Mr. HUDSON. A House bill similar to this has been reported favorably by the House committee. This is a Senate bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that a bill of this kind should be regularly considered.

Mr. KILGORE. It simply grants right of way, with the usual restrictions

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know what the restrictions are; I have not read the bill. If there were likely to be any material damage by reason of delay, of course I would consent that the bill be read and considered now; but I think it important that bills of this character should be carefully examined. objection to permitting the bill to lie on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to insist on my objection to immediate consideration.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that the bill lie on the Speaker's table. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mis-ouri [Mr. HEARD]? The Chair hears none; and it is so ordered.

PAY OF PER DIEM AND SESSION EMPLOYÉS, ETC.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk

The Clerk read as follows:

The Cierk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the per diem and session clerks and other session employes of the Senate and House of Representatives be retained in the service of the Senate and House of Representatives during the coming recess of Congress; and that the provisions of the joint resolution authorizing Members of the House of Representatives to certify monthly the amount paid or agreed to be paid by them for clerk hire necessarily employed by them in the discharge of their official and representative duties be, and the same are hereby, continued and made applicable during the coming recess of Congress; and a sum sufficient to meet the requirements of this joint resolution is here by appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this joint resolution at the present time? [A pause.] The Chair hears none; and the resolution (H. Res. 86) is before the House for consideration.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] strike out the appropriation in this resolu-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; I make that suggestion.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I did not hear the statement of the gentleman; I would like to hear it.
Mr. SAYERS. I understand that the resolution contains an indefinite appropriation.

Mr. RiCHARDSON of Tennessee. It contains an appropria-tion to pay the amount which will be due to these session clerks and employ s. The amount is not specified, because it is not definitely known.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I shall object to this unless the indefinite feature is stricken out.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will fix the amount, I will insert it. I do not know the exact amount.

Mr. SAYERS. There is no necessity of fixing the amount. There is a bill now pending between the Senate and the House which will amply provide for all these clerks.

which will amply provide for all these clerks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. During this vacation?

Mr. SAYERS. During this vacation. The bill contains an appropriation of $200,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not understand that the bill provides for the pay of employés during the present month.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The bill referred to does contain an appropriation, but without legislation of this character I presume the money would not be available for the payment of clerical service during the vacation—I mean from now until Decem-

Mr. SAYERS. But if the bill now pending between the Senate and the House be passed, the appropriation which it contains will be sufficient to pay those clerks.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The appropriation will be sufficient;

but without a resolution of this kind, there would be no authority in law to pay them. The gentleman from Tennessee might strike out the appropriation, and then if the legislation embraced in out the appropriation, and then it the legislation embraced in this resolution be passed, these employés could be paid in the event that the necessary appropriation is made.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman can amend the resolution if necessary so as to authorize payment; but I do protest against this House, a Democratic House, making an indefinite appropriation.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I under. stand it has never been the custom in a resolution of this kind to insert the exact amount called for; it is almost impossible to do so. Now, sir, in order to show the absolute necessity for the adoption of a resolution of this kind, I ask to have read at the Clerk's desk a communication signed by the Postmaster of the House and addressed to the Speaker; and I will say that what is true with reference to the employes of our post-office is true also as to all the other employes of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

House of Representatives, United States,

Washington, D. C., October 20, 1822.

SIR: I desire to submit that in the event of adjournment it will be impossible for me to maintain the efficiency of the service of the post-office of the House unless provision is made for continuing the session messengers on the pay-roll during the intermission.

My present force consists of the assistant postmaster, ten annual messengers, seven session messengers, and one laborer, the same in number as that of the Forty-seventh Congress, which consisted of only 29 members. Since that time the increase in membership, the vast increase in mail matter of all kinds, and especially of documents, the great expansion of the residence portion of the city, distributing members over a vast area, the allotment of clerks to members, etc., has fully doubled the work of the office and compelled me to apply to the Committee on Accounts of the present Congress for five additional messengers.

for five additional messengers.

Of the present force, four are employed in the office of the Capitol, and two at the city post-office, and if the session messengers are not continued only four men will remain to operate five delivery wagons and one large two-horse wagon for handling heavy bags.

In consideration, therefore, of this state of affairs, and from the fact that the annual messengers perform duty every day in the year including Sundays and holidays, and from the further fact that the work of the office will not be materially lessened by the short adjournment, I carnestly and respectfully recommend that the session messengers of the House post-office be continued on duty with pay during the interim.

Very respectfully,

L. DALTON.

Postmaster, House of Representatives.

Hon. C. F. CRISP, Speaker, House of Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In a moment I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to reply to the communication just

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that there is much force in the suggestion of the gentieman from Texas in reference to indefinite appropriations; but inasmuch as these salaries provided for in this resolution are the amounts in every case allowed under existing law, and fixed absolutely and certainly, so that there can be no deviation from them, it seems to me that it is unnecessary to stipulate in the resolution the aggregate amount, and for that reason I have not made the calculation. It is a mere matter of calculation.

The amount fixed by law for these salaries can neither be increased nor lessened; the law fixes the salary in every case, and hence there will be no need to make the computation and give the exact amount that the resolution would carry. I have not had the time to do it; and while I recognize that there is much force in the objection the gentleman makes to indefinite appropriations, yet I do not think it can apply to a case of this kind.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before the gentleman from Texas proceeds
I desire to know whether or not the same principle is not involved in the passage of the resolution now before the House that is involved in the contention between the House and the Senate on the amendment of the Senate to the urgent deficiency

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think not. In that case there was a vacation of over two months. Here, in this instance, there was a vacation of over two months. Here, in this instance, we are running into the last month.

You take, for instance, the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March, when this term of Congress expires; it has been the unbroken practice of the House, and of Congress, to pay the employes for the whole month, because they are kept here until the 4th, and frequently for days after the 4th, attending to the public business, and Congress has always appropriated for the entire month of March on the ground that it was just and equitable to allow it. table to allow it.

In this instance we keep these employés here until sometime in November, Mr. Speaker, and if there is ever a time it seems 3, to me when the members will need their clerical assistance, it to me when the medicers will need their clerical assistance, it will be during the few days of this recess. Many of these persons live too far away to go home, and they will have to remain here during the recess; and this resolution is only right and just under the circumstances.

I yield now to the gentleman from Texas as much time as he desires.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me its attention for a few moments I wish to reply to the letter which has just be read at the request of the gentleman from Tennessee.
When I heard that the application of the Postmuster was befor the Committee on Accounts for an increased force, I asked the Postmaster-General to send the best in pector he had to inspect that office. That inspection was made and a report was spect that office. That inspection was made and a report was made that in the judgment of the inspector no increased force was needed in that office, that there was enough force in the office to do the work of the House, and that all that was needed during the se sion was a man at the city post-office to assist the large wagon, but as to the increased clerical force he said there was no necessity for it.

Now, sir, a word as to the resolution proposed by the gentle-man from Tennessee. I wish to call the attention of the House, and especially the gentlem in from Tennessee, to the fact that in the Fifty-first Congress, when the then majority in this House were proposing indefinite appropriations, it met with the bitter-est protest and remonstrance from every Democrat in the House at that time, not only in the first, but also in the second session of that Congress. But now here, when the tables have been turned, we find Democrats proposing to do the very same thing that they censured the Republicans for doing in the Fifty-first

Mr. REED. Do not they always do that?

Mr. SAYERS. Not always, by any means.
Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman consider this an indefinite appropriation?
Mr. SAYERS. I do.

Mr. BOATNER. Can the gentleman maintain that, when every salary covered by the resolution is fixed by law and when not a dollar more can be paid out under the resolution than the

Mr. RYAN. This carries the whole amount. That is simply a play on words.
Mr. BUNN. It is only a question of calculation.
Mr. BOATNER. Let me ask the gentleman if the Committee on Appropriations makes provision in a bill "that an amount sufficient to pay the salaries of Members of Congress and Delegates, is hereby appropriated," whether it would be in his judgment as indefinite appropriation? ment an indefinite appropriation? Mr. SAYERS. It would.

Mr. BOATNER. Would it not be a mere matter of calcula-

Mr. SAYERS. I will explain to the gentleman the difference. When the sum total of the appropriation by Congress is to be made up the Clerk can only take the face of the bills and make up the aggregate from them. He can not go behind the bill and inquire as to the amounts that may be involved in the appropri-

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.
Mr. KILGORE. I would like to know what class of employés

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to know what class of employes are provided for by this resolution?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not understand exactly what it provides.

Mr. BUNN. Only the session employés.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman-from Tennessee who offered the resolution enlighten the House as to the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The session employés. Mr. KILGORE. Does that include clerks to members of the

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It does. It says so in so many words. It says, in so many words, the clerks to members. Mr. KILGORE. Then I am not in favor of that. Mr. BOATNER. You do not need to employ a clerk if you do not want one

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Richardson] to change that indefinite appropriation to a fixed amount, to be carried on the face of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman support the resolution then? Mr. SAYERS. It requires about $30,000 each month to pay for the clerks to members. As to the amount that will be for the clerks to members. As to the amount that will be necessary in order to pay the session employes, I can not say.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to ask my friend [Mr. SAYERS] if he considers an appropriation to pay the salary of the gentleman from Texas, we will say, which is fixed by law, without specifying the amount, an indefinite appropriation.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman seems to misunderstand the meaning of an "indefinite" appropriation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, I do, if the gentleman says that is an indefinite appropriation.

Mr. SAYERS. When the clerks of the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses come to make up their sum total, as they are required to do under the law of the amount of the are they are required to do under the law, of the amount of the appropriations for any Congress, they take the appropriations as they appear on the face of the bills that have passed and have become laws. They do not go behind the face of the bill in order to ascertain how much an appropriation involves. That Mr. HOLMAN. It must appear upon the face of the bill?

Mr. SAYERS. I so understand it.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This will not be an indefinite appropriation. It may not be fixed on the face of the resolution, but it is fixed by law, and can not be increased or diminished. I would not favor an indefinite appropriation. I have never done so. By that I mean an appropriation in which you never done so. By that I mean an appropriation in which you leave the amount open to be increased or diminished at the option of some departmental officer. But here is a case in which the amount is fixed in every instance by law, and can not be increased nor lessened. Will the gentleman give me the amount?

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman inform the House how can the clerks of the Appropriations Committees of the two Houses, should this resolution become a law, tell how much this bill carries or appropriates? Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, They can not tell from the face of the resolution. Unless they sit down and make the calculation they can not tell.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire that not only the House, but the country should know by reading the bills just how much Congress appropriates during this present session. That is what I de-

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] allow me a word or two?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes. How much time

Mr. KILGORE. Not over two minutes.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.
Mr. KILGORE. I understand this resolution proposes to do for the members of the House that which the House refused last night to do for the Senate; that is, to pay for their clerk hire during the vacation. The proposition is to increase the force, pay employés whose services and pay ends with the adjournment to-day a salary during the vacation, and this includes members' clerks.

I can not assent to that proposition. The argument which was made in favor of the resolution to allow each member a clerk during the session was based on the idea that the member has a great deal of extra work to perform growing out of his general duties as a Representative—going to the Departments, attending to correspondence, etc. Besides that he is charged with the duty of sending out documents, seed, and other public plunder furnished by the Government with which to electioneer, and that he had no time for preparation on the work in the House and in committee. In fact, that he had no time to think; that while he was engaged in doing all the drudgery which the law and long usage imposed on him, meditation on finance, and tariff, and bankruptcy, and other grave and intricate problems was out of the question. It was contended that he ought to have a clerk to do this drudgery to the end that he might have an oppor-tunity to think. That appeared to be the purpose of the reso-

The only chance a member had to think under the old régime was while en route to and from his boarding house.

Mr. REED. I would suggest to the gentleman from Texas, if that was the object, the experiment is evidently a failure in this Congress.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Maine suggests that the whole scheme has been a blooming fallure, if that was the purpose. That was the sole purpose, as I understand, to take purpose. That was the sole purpose, as I understand to take the drudgery off members that they might be able to think a little. [Laughter.] Ego cogito sum—I think, so I exist. Thinking is necessary to existence. [Laughter.] Now, I say this Congress is threatening to adourn at a very early hour—

Mr. REED. I like the word "threatening."

Mr. KILGORE (continuing). And the purpose of this adjournment is to relax the stringency of the thinking machinery of each member, and turns him loose unencumbered by any obligation to cogitate; and, being thus unhindered, he can send out his tion to cogitate; and, being thus unfindered, he can send out his own books, seeds, and documents. He can write his own letters and attend to his duties at the various Departments and bureaus. The reason for the clerk does not exist during the vacation, hence the clerk ought not to exist. If I need a clerk during the vacation to help me to think and perform other light duties I ought to pay him myself, not call on the Government to do so. If I need a clerk to attend to my duties while off frolicking over the country and taking in the various shows and the various fairs the country and taking in the various shows and the various fairs and performances, then I ought to pay him myself out of my own pocket. I can not agree to the passage of this measure unless a quorum should happen to be present and voting. That observation is meant as a prediction and not as a threat. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I urged—

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I urged— The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman what time he requests?

Mr. HOLMAN. Five minutes. I just want to call attention to an incident that occurred yesterday.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. On yesterday when the subject of the adjournment of the House was under consideration, I urged the propriety of a recess, especially upon the ground that by that means all the committees of the House that were prepared to continue their work could do so, and have their bills, especially appropriation bills controlled by the several committees having appropriations in charge, ready when Congress met in December.

The argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was that it was a measure of the argument made against this was the argument made against the argumen extravagance, because you would have to pay the session em-I presume some gentlemen were influenced in the inter-ployés. I presume some gentlemen were influenced in the interest of economy in voting against a recess instead of an adjournment. That is all I have to say, sir. On yesterday the argument was that it would get rid of the payment of these clerks, and today a resolution is brought in so that the clerks may be paid.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, as I understand the statement of the gentleman from Texas, it is that he thinks the resolution ought to fix a limit upon the amount beyond which it shall not go for the payment of the clerks to members, and he suggested $30,000 as the amount it would take to pay for one month. I have prepared a little amendment which I will offer, providing that the amount for the payment of clerks to members shall not exceed $30,000. The gentleman made no other objection. Now I understand the gentleman's objection to go beyond that. yond that Mr. SAYERS. Will not the gentleman state the amount carried by the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not do that, because

If do not know what it is.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman is not able to inform the House what the amount is, he ought not to have brought the resolution in

Mr. HOLMAN. The Clerk of the House can estimate what the amount will be in ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Why not change the joint resolution and make it a House resolution, and make the payment of session employés and for clerical assistance to members from the contingent fund? If that is done the contingent fund can be utilized, and if there is any deficiency that would be provided for in the regular way.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee.

I would be content to do this in any other way, but I do insist these employes should be paid for the month of November. I understood that my friend did not put his objection on the merits, but on the technical ground

Mr. BLAIR. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to me for a moment?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I listened with much interest to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Kilgore] that the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] that the object of this movement to have clerks for the assistance of members was in order that he might "think." I did not understand that that was the object. I think that would require perhaps an act of creative power [laughter]; and that the Supreme Being would have to try again in some cases. [Laughter.] My idea, perhaps, if I were to search for a recondite and almost unanswormhle source of argument in favor of this resolution would unansworable source of argument in favor of this resolution would be this idea, that we might continue to do the drudgery, and pay someone who had capacity to think for us. [Laughter.] But now, Mr. Speaker, the truth is just this, this drudgery has been upon us all through the session, and it will be upon us to a greater extent during the vacation. If these clerks are permitted to remain and to do any duty at all it will take them about two weeks to finish up the drudgery which has accumulated during this session, and they are required all the remaining time. These clerks will have to work harder during this month than during any other portion of the time they have been in the service of the members of the House; so that I think, on every account that can be urged, these clerks ought to be halved out. helped out.

If it is for the benefit of members at all, I think these clerks should be paid.

Mr. KILGORE (to Mr. BLAIR). Mr. Speaker, I understand you to say that you "think." Has there been any authority, either divine or human, for you to think in this matter? [Laugh.

Mr. BLAIR. I assume the authority. I think the gentleman from Texas would do well to "think" more. [Laughter.]

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that unless he may have some further communication to make, the two Houses of Congress have finished the business before them, and are ready to adjourn.

The resolution was adopted, and the Speaker appointed as a committee on the part of the House, Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. TURNER and Mr. DINGLEY

PAY OF PER DIEM AND SESSION EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have conferred with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], and I have also had some figures made here hurriedly by the best expert in the employ of the House on such a subject, the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations. It is estimated that it will not take exceeding $40,000 to provide for the appropriation made under this joint resolution. I will therefore offer a proviso that the amount appropriated shall not exceed $40,000. The gentleman from Texas is satisfied with that, and I hope it will be entitief to the House. e satisfactory to the House. Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana.

I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Texas whether or not they are satisfied that this simple form of resolution will carry the are satisfied that this simple form of resolution will carry the appropriation and fully justify each member in expending money in the employment of a clerk during the month of November?

Mr. SAYERS. Unquestionably. This is a joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I did not understand that; I thought it was a simple House resolution.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a late.

The SPEAKER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "appropriated" insert the following: "Provided, The amount appropriated in this resolution shall not exceed $40,000."

The SPEAKER. Without objection the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the resolution as amended.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.
The SPEAKER. Upon ordering the yeas and nays, Il gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. There has been no vote this morning, so the Chair will count the other side. Those opposed will rise. [After the count.] Upon this question 11 gentlemen have risen in the affirmative and 128 in the negative. The year and nays are refused.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum has voted. The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum. One-fifth of the members present, whether the number be more or less than a quorum, may demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I understand that; but I make the point that there is no quorum present to transact this business.

Mr. COGSWELL. The point is too late.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of the gentleman from

Mr. HUTCHESON. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker-I do not claim to be a parliamentarian and I may be in error—I make the point of order that there has been a vote, which goes on the record, and which discloses the fact that there is not a quorum of the members of this House present.

A MEMBER. What vote?
Mr. HUTCHESON. The vote just taken.
Mr. COGSWELL. That was not a vote. That was a count upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I submit to the Chair whether the point is well taken or not.
The SPEAKER. Of course on the question of the adoption

The SPEAKER. Of course on the question of the adoption of the result there must be a quorum voting if the point made. Mr. HUTCHESON. Whenever anything transpires that goes upon the record and shows there is no quorum voting—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas should understand the point. The Constitution of the United States provides that one-fifth of the members present may have a yea-and-nay or record vote. Even if there were not more than twenty or twenty-five members present, one-fifth of them could order the yeas and nays upon any question, and there must always be a quorum voting for the transaction of business. The adoption of that resolution is business, and if the gentleman makes the point that no quorum votes upon the resolution, the Chair has just made was upon the question of ordering the yeas and nays, just made was upon the question of ordering the yeas and nays, and not upon the question of agreeing to the joint resolution.

Mr. HUTCHESON. That is all right, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read a third time.

The joint resolution was accordingly read the third time.
The SPEAKER. Shall this joint resolution pass?
Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I submit the point of order that there has been no vote on the second reading.
The SPEAKER. The joint resolution has been ordered to a third reading, and it has been read the third time.
Mr. KILGORE. But it was not ordered by a vote of the

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair stated that if there was no objection the amendment would be agreed to. That was done without a vote. Then, as the Chair understood, without objection, the resolution was ordered to a third reading. Then the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] demanded the yeas and nays, and they were refused. Now the question is: Shall the resolu-

Mr. KILGORE. Ithink the Chair is in error if he will pardon me.

The SPEAKER. Of course, if the Chair is in error he wants to be corrected Mr. KILGORE. Before the question was submitted my colleague from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] demanded the yeas and

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; not before the question was submitted.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, before it was voted on by the House I was on the floor to demand a division on that question when I was interrupted

The SPEAKER. Why, there was a division—that is the Chair thinks there was; there may be a mistake. But according to the recollection of the Chair there was a division, and then a demand was made for the yeas and nays; and the Chair stated that the point of "no quorum" could not be made on a demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I would like to appeal to the notes of the stenographer on this point.

The SPEAKER. The point is not at all material, because the vote will now come on the passage of the resolution. [A pause.] The stenographers state that the Chair has correctly given the position of the question.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Then I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The question is now, Shall the joint resolu-

The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 149, nays 53, not voting 151; as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote just taken and move to lay that motion on the table.
Mr. HUTCHESON. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 4 o'clock. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONEY. We are going to adjourn at 3 o'clock.
The SPEAKER. What motion does the gentleman from Texas submit?

Mr. HUTCHESON. That the House take a recess until fif-Mr. Holleson. That the House take a recess that he teen minutes before 3 o'clock.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it be in order to move to suspend the rules and pass this resolution?

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending for a recess. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand it, the Senate has agreed to the resolution to adjourn at 3 o'clock today, which resolution was passed by the House. Now, I move to suspend the rules and lay the motion to reconsider on the

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Texas has a motion pending for a recess which must be disposed of first.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr.

HUTCHESON) there were—ayes 4, noes 143.
Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. HUTCHESON and Mr. RICH-

ARDSON of Tennessee as tellers.

Mr. SHAW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, for the purpose of saving time, and possibly giving some information to the gentleman from Texas. The Chair decided that the resolution was passed.

The SPEAKER. The vote by yeas and nays adopted the resolution.

Mr. SHAW. I understand that, Mr. Speaker. Whereupon a motion is made to reconsider that vote and lay it on the table. Pending that the gentleman from Texas moves to take a recess. Now, I would like to have the Chair state to the gentleman if this filibustering should continue until 3 o'clock, whether it would in any way affect the resolution itself?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair will state, however, that this being a joint resolution, of course in order to be operative it must be agreed to by both the House and Senate.

Mr. SHAW. But has it not already passed the House?

The SPEAKER. It has, but a motion to reconsider is pend-

Mr. SHAW. Would any filibustering proceedings continued up to the hour of adjournment defeat that action of the House? The SPEAKER. But the resolution will not be sent from the House while the motion to reconsider is pending.

Mr. SHAW. I understand that, but I wanted the information for the benefit of the gentleman from Texas to show that we are losing time by this proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (one of the tellers). I withdraw the motion to reconsider and lay on the table.

Mr. HUTCHESON. And I renew it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I move to suspend the rules and lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HUTCHESON. The motion before the House is the mo-

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no; the gentleman withdraws that motion when he submits another.
Mr. HUTCHESON. I beg pardon; I did not. The gentleman's proposition to withdraw his motion is very witty, but it has no significance parliamentarily. It is not in order to submit his new motion while mine is pending.

his new motion while mine is pending.

Mr. TRACEY. But you withdrew it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he did not.

Mr. HUTCHESON. No, sir; I did not. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Does the Chair understand me to withdraw the

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to state that he did not. Why does the gentleman ask such a question. Mr. HUTCHESON. I understood the Chair to ask me it I withdrew my motion. The SPEAKER.

The gentleman stated himself that he had not withdrawn it. Mr. HUTCHESON. I am glad the Chair and myself agree. Mr. RYAN. But he has made a motion to reconsider the vote

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary in quiry.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the Chair please state the parliamentary status of the question?
The SPEAKER. The status of the question is, first, a vote on the pending motion for a recess, on which no quorum has

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the Chair indulge me a moment?

The SPEAKER. If there is any question of fact on which the gentleman wishes to be heard, the Chair will of course recognize him.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. When I withdrew the motion to reconsider and lay on the table, the gentleman from Texas then made another or renewed the motion that I had withdrawn. Now he abandons his motion for a recess when he makes another which is independent, separate, and apart from the motion for a recess. The motion to reconsider and lay on the table, the two motions combined together as one, is the pending motion, and the gentleman can not make that motion while the motion for a recess is pending. Therefore he must have withdrawn the mo-tion for a recess in order to submit the other.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the Chair would not hold any gen-tleman to any technical rule. The gentleman made the point that no quorum had voted upon the motion for a recess. Tellers were appointed. The tellers had taken their places. The House was dividing. In that state of the cess the gentleman from Tenwas dividing. In that state of the case the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] withdrew his motion—not the motion for the recess, but the motion that was pending to reconsider and lay upon the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] then stated that he renewed the motion. Any gentleman who voted in the affirmative, of course, had the right to renew who voted in the affirmative, of course, had the right to renew the motion to reconsider, and that could be entered, the Chair will state, pending any business, because it must be entered under the rules, within a limited time.

Mr. REED. Did the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON vote with the majority?

Mr. HUTCHESON. I did, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the gentleman

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, is it in order now for me to ask the gentleman to withhold the motion long enough for me to make a report from a committee and get it onto the Calendar? I am afraid the opportunity will be lost if that action is not now taken. If the gentleman will be kind enough to allow me to do that, it will save the trouble of calling for the regular

The SPEAKER. No quorum has voted on the motion for a recess. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee has passed the House'

The SPEAKER. It has,
Mr. POWERS. And that a motion to reconsider and to lay that motion on the table was made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], and is now withdrawn.
The SPEAKER. It has been renewed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON].
Mr. POWERS. Now, in the event that 3 o'clock is reached before any vote on the motion to reconsider, does not that leave the resolution as passed by the House. The SPEAKER. Passed by the House, undoubtedly.

The SPEAKER. Passed by the House, undoubtedly.
Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But this is a joint resolution, which requires the action of the Senate.
The SPEAKER. As many as favor the motion that the House take a recess until fifteen minutes before 3 o'clock will pass between tellers and be counted.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 3, noes 177.

So the motion was rejected. Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to suspend the rules and lay upon the table the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will put the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, what is the motion of the gentleman gentleman?

The SPEAKER. To suspend the rules and lay upon the table the motion to reconsider. Under the rules, during the last six days of a session a motion to suspend the rules is in order.
Mr. HUTCHESON. I move that the House do now adjourn. The SPEAKER. That motion is in order. Pending a motion to suspend the rules, one motion to adjourn is in order. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON] moves that the House do now adjourn. do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the pes seemed to have it. Mr. HUTCHESON. I call for a division on that, Mr. Speaker. The House divided; and there were—ayes 4, noes 150. Mr. HUTCHESON. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. It does not require a quorum to refuse to adjourn. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] to suspend the rules and lay upon the table the motion to reconsider entered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUTCHESON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr.

HUTCHESON) there were—ayes 165, noes 17.

The SPEAKER. Two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules are suspended and the motion to reconsider is laid upon the table. [Applause.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. HUTCHESON. My point of order is that a motion was pending to reconsider the vote by which a resolution was passed.
That has never been acted upon.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas entered a metion to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to a resolution was passed.

the to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to a resolution, and the gentleman from Tennessee moved to suspend the rules and lay that motion upon the table—

Mr. HUTCHESON. And that was the vote just taken.

The SPEAKER (continuing). And two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the motion to lay on the table prevailed. The gentleman from Tennessee desires to submit a resolution.

Mr. HUTCHESON. I have to thank my followers, and I hope,

Mr. Speaker

Mr. BROWN. Regular order.
The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.
Mr. HUTCHESON. I ask that I may have an hour-The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order.
Mr. HUTCHESON. To state my side to the House.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be in order; and the House will be in order.

Mr. CARUTH. Regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports, and the Clerk will call the committees.

CASH ENTRIES OF OFFERED LANDS.

Mr. SOMERS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted a report on the bill (H. R. 4244) confirming cash entries of offered lands

Mr. SOMERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the question of privilege on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin claims that this bill has some degree of privilege, by reason of the fact that it had been recommitted by the House with instructions. The gentleman reports it now; and, without objection, the question as to its privileged character will not be considered as waived as to its privileged character will not be considered as waived by reporting it, but will be determined whenever the matter is called to the attention of the House at the next session.

Mr. WELLS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether the bill is amended so as to include more than the three States mentioned in the original bill?

Mr. SOMERS. I think it comprises only the three States.

The information called for is furnished in the report.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be ordered printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

ADMISSION OF ARIZONA.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Territories reported the bill (H. R. 4393) as a substitute for the bill (H. R. 3332) to provide for the admission of the State of Arizona into the Union, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The original bill will lie on the table.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN THE DISTRICT OF CO-LUMBIA.

Mr. COBB of Alabama, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. SATURDAY HALF HOLIDAY IN EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I report back for reference the joint resolution (H. Res. 84), making Saturday a half holiday for the Executive Departments in the District of Columbia. The title of the bill indicates that it should go to the Committee on the District of Columbia, but on examination it would appear that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Committee on the District of Columbia will be discharged from the consideration of this bill, and it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection.

The call of committees for reports were resumed and con-

EASTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF FLORIDA

Mr. BOATNER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the bill (H. R. 51) creating the eastern judicial district of Florida, with amendments.

The title of the bill was reported.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill. It is merely a change in the boundaries of the judicial district in the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to consider the bill just reported by the Committee of the Indicator.

The Clork will reserve the bill with the committee of the Indicator.

on the Judiciary. The Clerk will report be no objection the House will consider it. The bill was read, as follows: The Clerk will report the bill, and if there

SEC. 2. That terms of the district and circuit courts for said district shall be held at Jacksonville, Fla., beginning on the first Monday of December of sach year.

Sec. 3. That the district judge for the southern district of Florida shall be the district judge for the eastern district of Florida, and he may exercise at any place in either of said districts any and all powers which are or may be vested in him for either or both of said districts which can be exercised out

Vested in that to treat the content of term.

SEC. 4: That a district attorney and a marshal for said eastern district of Florida, and a clerk for said district court, a clerk for the circuit court for said district, and all other officers pertaining to or provided by law for district or circuit courts shall be appointed for said courts for said eastern district of Florida as prescribed by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. OATES. I desire to ask my colleague on the committee a question. Does this provide for an additional district attorney and judge for the same district?

Mr. BOATNER. No, sir. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a statement about the bill which will take but a moment. The Committee on the Judiciary reports the bill back with amendment. The bill as reported merely provides that certain counties in the State of Florida which have heretofore been attached to the pathbach distribute and at to the northern district be detached from that district and attached to the southern district. It creates no new offices, and entails not a dellar of expense, but merely reorganizes the lines of the two judicial districts to meet the convenience and wants of the people. There is no possible objection to the bill.

Mr. OATES (to Mr. BOATNER). Your report is a substitute for the original bill?

Mr. BOATNER. Practically it is.
Mr. OATES. The Clerk read just now, probably from the original bill, a provision for the creation of two offices, clerk and district attorne

Mr. BOATNER. We have struck that all out.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as

Strike out in lines 3 and 4 of section I the words "a judicial district called the eastern district of Florida is hereby created composed of," and insert at the end of section I the following: "be and the same are hereby detached from the northern judicial district of said State, and attached to the south-ern judicial district thereof."

In line 2 of section 2, after the word "said," insert "southern," and add to said section the following: "In addition to the terms at Key West and Tampa as now provided by law."
Strike out sections 3 and 4, and add the following as section 3:
SEC. 3. And be if Jurther endeted, That all cases or proceedings pending in the circuit court for the northern district of Florida, at Jacksonville, Fla., or filed in the office of the clerk of said circuit court, at Jacksonville aforesaid, and all records of said court at Jacksonville aforesaid, are hereby transferred to said circuit court for the southern district of Florida, to be proceeded with therein as if originally instituted in said court. And all cases or proceedings pending in the district court for the northern district of Florida, at Jacksonville, Fla., or filed in the office of the clerk of said district court, at Jacksonville aforesaid, and all records of said court at Jacksonville aforesaid, are hereby transferred to said district court for the southern district of Florida, to be proceeded with therein as if originally instituted in said court.

The amendments were adopted.

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOATNER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table

The latter motion was agreed to.
The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to change the boundaries of the judicial districts of the State of Florida.

DAMS ACROSS KANSAS RIVER.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the deak.

The title of the bill was read, as follows: A bill (H. R. 340) to authorize the construction and maintenance of a dam or dams across the Kansas River, within Shawnee County, in the State of Kansas

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, pending the request of the gentleman from Kansas, I desire to present a conference report. I wish to present it at this time in order to give an opportunity for the bill to be engrossed.

The SPEAKER. A conference report is, of course, privileged. REMISSION OF DUTIES ON GOODS EXHIBITED AT CHICAGO.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The connected report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved April 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

W. D. BYNUM,
BENTON MOMILLIN, SERENO S. PAYNE,
Managers on the part of the House. JUSTIN F. MORRILL, ISHAM G. HARRIS, Managers on the part of the Senate.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BYNUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS FOR MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a House resolution with Senate amendments. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, strike out "twenty-two" and insert "fifteen."
Line 5, strike out all after "Congressional Record" down to "extraor-mary," lines 11 and 12, and insert "during the first;" so that the resolution

Line 5, Strike out at a tell dinary. Ilnes 11 and 12, and insert "during the first;" so that the resolution will read:

*Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Public Printer be directed to furnish to each Representative and Delegate 15 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD during the first session of the Fifty-third Congress.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The effect of this amendment is simply to give members of the House and Delegates 37 copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD instead of 44, as provided for in the resolution passed by the House. Senators get only 37 copies each, and they do not think they ought to agree to give members of the House a larger number than they get them-elves, as that has never been done in the distribution of any public document. Gentlemen will understand that this applies only to the present session. The permanent increase of 8 additional copies will be provided for in the printing bill which has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment

The amendment was concurred in.

DAMS ACROSS KANSAS RIVER.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the bill presented by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS].

The bill (H. R. 340) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senats and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Chicago-Topeka Light, Heat, and lower Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of LOM.

Illinois, its successors and assigns, be, and they are bereby, authorized and empowered to construct and maintain a dam or dams across the Kansas River, at any suitable place or places within the county of Shawnee, in the State of Kansas.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read. as follows:

as follows:

Strike out section 2 and insert the following:

"Provided, That on notice by the Secretary of War that said dam or dams are material obstructions to navigation, said dam or dams shall be at once removed, or suitable lock or locks provided by the owner or owners thereof at his or their expense, so as not to interfere with navigation: And provided further. That if after due and sufficient notice in such case the owner or owners of said dam or dams shall neglect or fail to provide suitable lock or locks, or otherwise modify or remove said obstructions, in such manner as the Secretary of War may direct, the said Secretary is hereby authorized and directed to cause suitable lock or locks to be provided, or said obstructions to be removed or modified at the expense of the United States, and to institute proceedings against the person or persons or corporation owning or controlling said dam or dams for the recovery of the expense thereof before the circuit court of the United States in and for the district in which said dam or dams may be located.

"Sec 2. That the dam or dams herein provided for shall be commenced within one year from the date of approval of this act and completed within three years, under penalty of the forfeiture of the franchise herein granted, "Sec 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, that bill is too important to reserved.

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, that bill is too important to pass under a unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Some time subsequently:

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill called up by the gentleman from Kansas

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks un inimous consent for the consideration of this bill. The gentlem in from Indiana objected, but now withdraws the objection. Is there further objection?

There being no objection the bill was considered, the amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that gentlemen desiring to print remarks upon the pending bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy may be permitted to do so.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution for immediate consideration.

Mr. MEYER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report.

Mr. MEYER. I withdraw the demand for the regular order. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] states that he desires to present a privileged report.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the following resolu-

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives be authorized to close the present session by adjourning their respective Houses on the 3d day of November present, at 3 o'clock p. m.

The message also announced that the Senate still further insists upon its amendment, numbered 6, to the bill (H. R. 4177) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives, and had appointed Mr. Cockrell, Mr. GORMAN, and Mr. CULLOM as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved. That a committee of two members of the Senate be appointed to join a similar committee on the part of the House of Representatives to wait on the Fresidevt of the United States and inform him that the two Houses of Congress are ready to adjourn, and respectfully inquire if he has any further communication to make to them.

In compliance with the foregoing resolution the Presiding Officer appointed as said committee Mr. RANSOM and Mr. CUL-

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 4015) in aid of the World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition to be held at New York City.

PAY OF LETTER-CARRIERS.

The resolution was read, as follows:

The resolution was read, as ionows:

Resolved. That the Postmaster-General be, and is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives whether the claims of letter-carriers for form the House of Representatives whether the claims of letter-carriers for compensation in excess of eight hours per day, under the act of May 20, 1888, as decided by the Court of Claims March 7, 1892, are being received, or can be received, adjusted, and paid, or certified to Congress for appropriation, without the intervention or services of attorneys.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads having considered this resolution, recommend its passage.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, this is merely a formal resolution calling on the Postmoster-General for

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The purpose is to ascer tain from the Postmaster-General whether it is necessary that letter-carriers having claims for extra service under the eight-hour law are required to employ attorneys.

Mr. BINGHAM. It carries with it no appropriation; it simply calls for information.

Mr. McMILLIN. It imposes no additional charge on the Government?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. None whatever.

Mr. BINGHAM. It simply asks for information whether it is necessary for these carriers to pay fees to attorneys, or whether the Department will settle the claims without the intervention of attorneys.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

PAYMENT FOR CLERICAL SERVICES TO MEMBERS.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to use any money to the credit of miscellaneous items of the contingent fund in the payment of Members and Delegates the amounts which they have paid or agreed to pay for clerk hire necessarily employed by them in the discharge of their official and representative duties during the month of October, and to and including the 3d day of November, 1893, as authorized by the joint resolution approved March 3, 1893.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Clerk of the House that of the specific appropriation made for the pay-ment of clerk hire there is not a sufficient amount remaining to make payment for the month of October and for the portion of the present month which has already expired, but that if the general contingent fund be used for this purpose he will have enough for the purpose. He believes that without a resolution of this kind he has the authority to make such payment; but I am apprehensive that on the presentation of his accounts at the ury Department they would not be allowed by the accounting officers without such provision as is embraced in this resolution. Therefore, out of abundance of caution, I ask the adoplution. tion of the resolution.

Many MEMBERS. All right.
There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

PAYMENT TO WIDOW OF REV. S. W. HADDAWAY.

Mr. COBB of Alabama, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to Mary E. Haddaway, widow of Samuel W. Haddaway, deceased, late Chaplain of the House of Representatives, a sum equal to one year of the salary paid to the chaplain, and he be further directed to pay out of the contingent fund to said Mary E. Haddaway the expenses attending the last filness and funeral of the deceased Chaplain, not to exceed in amount the sum of $500.

DIPLOMAS FOR DESIGNERS, INVENTORS, ETC.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk. I desire to explain that this resolution embraces one of the sections of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill which is about to fail—the portion which has been unanimously agreed to at this session by both Houses of Congress. Unless this provision be adopted in a separate resolution, it must fail along with the deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution sent to the desk will be read, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 77) conferring diplomas upon designers, inventors, and expert artisans.

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a diploma of honorable mention may be conferred upon designers, inventors, and expert artisans who have assisted in the production and perfection of such exhibits as are awarded diplomas in the World's Columbian Exposition or are formally commended by the Director-General thereof; and authority is hereby given to the Board of Lady Managers of the World's Columbian Commission, acting in conjunction with the Associated American Exhibitors, to present said diplomas of honorable mention to said designers, inventors, and expert artisans whenever a certificate is filed with said Board of Lady Managers by an exhibitor who has received a medal and diploma or the formal commendation of the Director-General setting forth the name or names of designers, inventors, and expert artisans who have assisted in the production and perfection of the exhibits for which said medals and diplomas were awarded or commendation made, the expense thereof to be paid from the sum of $100,000 appropriated by an act approved March 3, 1833, making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, for the payment of judges, examiners, and members of the committees to be appointed by the Board of Lady Managers as authorized by section 6 of an act approved April 25, 1800, authorizing the World's Columbian Exposition and appropriating money therefor.

The SPEAKER. The amendments proposed to be adopted as a part of this resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, after the word "commission," in line 9, strike out the words acting in conjunction with the Associated American Exhibitors," On page 2, line 18, after the word "the," insert "aggregate." In line 18, after the word "thereof." insert "not to exceed $5,000."

Mr. SPRINGER. The object of these amendments is to make Senate in connection with the urgent deficiency bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] understands this matter, and will make any further explanation which may be necessary.

Mr. KILGORE. I object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not object. [A pause.] Will the Chair recognize me to move to suspend the rules and pass this resolution? The proposition does not involve any expense to the Government, and has already been agreed to harbor the ungarnery deliciency. by both Houses unanimously as a part of the urgency deficiency bill. I move to suspend the rules and pass this joint resolution. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to suspend the rules and pass the resolution as read with the amend-

The SPEAKER proceeded to put the question on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. CULBERSON. I make the point that the motion to suspend the rules has not yet been seconded.

The SPEAKER. Nobody called for a second upon the mo-

Mr. CULBERSON. We are entitled to have that question submitted. We do not know what the proposition is.

The SPEAKER. It has been read, and, as the Chair understands, is the same as a provision in the urgent deficiency bill now pending between the two Houses.

Mr. McMILLIN. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, that while this resolution may be entirely proper, the House can not be deprived of the right to have the question taken upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules. I submit that, without the point being raised by any member, the Chair should put the question, "Is a second demanded?"

The SPEAKER. That is usual. The Chair will put that question now. Is a second demanded on the motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. CULBERSON. I demand a second, because I want to understand what this bill is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint tellers.
Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] may be permitted to explain this matter.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am willing that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, as I understand, there is opportunity under the rules for fifteen minutes debate on each side.

The SPEAKER. There is. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to control the time in favor of the proposition, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBER-

SON] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield to the gentleman trom Texas [Mr.

SAYERS] as much time as he may desire.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, the provision of the resolution is the same as a Senate amendment to the urgent deficiency bill which has been agreed to by the House.

It only provides that out of the sum of money heretofore ap of Lady Managers may use the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the issuance of diplomas to the workmen who made the different fabrics that have been exhibited at the World's Fair and which have taken premiums. It contains no additional appropriation, but simply authorizes the issuance of the diplomas to these workingmen.

Mr. CULBERSON. Where would the money go if this authority were not given as proposed here?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know whether it would be expended or not.

Mr. CULBERSON. But that is just the point.
Mr. BLANCHARD. It would not go back into the Treasury, you may be sure of that.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to know, if this bill does not pass, where the money would go? I think it is a pertinent inquiry.

Mr. SAYERS. But we do not know whether there is any money on hand or not.

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, if there is?
Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. If there is any on hand, and this provision was not enacted, it would be used for other expenditures already authorized by law, would it not?
Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.
Mr. SAYERS.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would be used for expenditures which are already authorized.

Mr. KILGORE. They say it will be used to pay other expenses. Now, I think it is about time to call a halt on this kind

Mr. SAYERS. But this does not appropriate a dollar.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not a cent.
Mr. KILGORE. Oh, I understand that. This provides for the payment of $5,000 for these medals, and if it passes that much money is taken out of the appropriations already provided for, and there will be necessarily a deficiency in these other appropriations, so that they will come to Congress sometime hereafter and ask us to make the amount good.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not at all.
Mr. SAYERS. It will not involve a dollar of appropriation.
Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think there will not be any demand on Congress for such purpose. But suppose there is.
There is great equity and justice in giving the compliment of a diploma to the men whose brains originated and whose hands wrought out many of these wondrous works of art which have been exhibited at Chicago; and it seems to me that it is a graceful thing for the American Congress to do.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, I am very sorry the gentleman from Illinois said that. I do not think it is a graceful thing.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is for the workingmen exclusively. It has been petitioned for by the workingmen's organizations all over the country.

over the countr

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that is the allegation. We hear that constantly said about such things, but it is not always true. Mr. SPRINGER. But in this case it expressly provides that it is for them. Mr. KILGORE. That is the story, that it is for the benefit of the workingman; but there are plenty of workingmen down in my country who have no such benefits conferred upon them.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will not cost a dollar of appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, the gentleman will probably have a

Mr. Kildovice. Well, the gentleman will probably have a quorum for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not intervene at this hour to call for a quorum. I have stated several times that this is a proposition in the interests of the workingmen's organization in Chicago

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Illinois is wasting his

Mr. SPRINGER (continuing). And these organizations all over the country have petitioned for the resolution. It is to give a diploma to the workingmen.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that. If the gentleman had been willing to extend this session as it should have been extended we would have had plenty of time to examine this matter and understand it thoroughly.

Mr. SPRINGER. It has already twice passed the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution.

The question was taken: and on a division, demanded by Mr.

KILGORE, there were—ayes 126, noes 6.
So, no further count being demanded, the rules were suspended and the joint resolution passed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE TO WAIT UPON THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the committee appointed, to join the committee appointed by the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that Congress had finished its labors, have performed that duty and report that the President informed the committee that he had no further communication to make at this time to Congress. He further expressed the wish for the safe return of the members of the House and Senate to their respective homes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED,

Mr.PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the

A bill (H. R. 4015) in aid of the World's Fair Prize Winners' Exposition, to be held at New York City.

Joint resolution (H. Res. 22) to amend the act approved April 25, 1890, relating to the admission of articles intended for the World's Columbian Exposition; and A bill (H. R. 4186) to regulate the fees of the clerk of the United States court for the Indian Territory.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment join resolution (H. Res. 36) to pay session and per diem employés and other employés, and that they be retained during the coming session, in which concurrence of the House was requested.

SESSION EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I desire to lay before the House a House joint resolution with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 86) to pay session and per diem employés and other employés, and that they be retained during the coming recess.

The SPEAKER. The clerk will report the amendment of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 16, after the word "dollars," insert: "And the sum of $22,088 is nereby appropriated for contingent expenses of the Senate, namely, for misellaneous items exclusive of labor, for the fiscal year 1891."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I move to suspend the rules and concur in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I would like to inquire if the Senate amendment is not exactly the amendment that the House voted down yesterday in the conference report?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not informed on that,
Mr. BLANCHARD. I ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr.

SAYERS] if that is not true?

Mr. SAYERS. It is, in another form.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. M Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. I desire to make a statement to the House which affects the amendment under consideration. ferees on the part of the House have had a fourth conference with the Senate conferees and have declined to advise the House to recede. I am authorized by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate to say to the House that no deficiency bill of whatever kind or for whatever purpose shall pass the Senate until the session clerks and Senators' clerks shall be paid for the months of October and November, 1890. I think it is due to the House, in view of what has transpired at the present session and also in former sessions, that I should make this statement

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope there will be no objection to concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (to Mr. SAYERS). Will not that involve a failure to pass the deficiency bill whereby the House clerks will receive their October salary?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; the October salaries of clerks will be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. There is money sufficient to pay them.

ufficient to pay them.

Mr. CARUTH. But the item for the elevator employes and the deficiency appropriation for lighting and heating public buildings will fail to pass.

Mr. SAYERS. We have just passed a resolution authorizing the clerks to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Is not this the same appropriation that has

Mr. McMILLIN. And now they propose to say that appropriations shall fail unless this is allowed to pass?

Mr. SAYERS. I did not say that the Senators so proposed. I only state that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate has authorized me to state the fact to the House. Mr. McMILLIN. He is their mouthpiece? Mr. SAYERS. I do not know.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I would like to ask the gentleman if this amendment, incorporated by the Senate in the pending resolution, is not the very one that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. olution, is not the very one that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] opposed yesterday, and in which opposition the House by an overwhelming majority sustained him?
